The Claim of Humanity in Christ:
Salvation and Sanctification in the Theology of T.F. and J.B. Torrance

A thesis submitted by Alexandra Sophie Radcliff

For the degree of Doctor of Philosophy

To the Faculty of Divinity
The University of St Andrews

2014
Table of Contents

Declarations .................................................................................................................................................. 4
Abstract ...................................................................................................................................................... 5
Acknowledgements ....................................................................................................................................... 6

Introduction ............................................................................................................................................ 7

PART ONE: THE TRIUNE GOD OF GRACE AND SALVATION .................................................................... 17

1. The Father as Covenant not Contract God: Filial over Federal ................................................................. 18
   Who over How ........................................................................................................................................... 21
   Covenant versus Contract .......................................................................................................................... 25
   Election is Grace ....................................................................................................................................... 32
   Universal Atonement and Universalism ....................................................................................................... 37
   God’s Sovereignty and Human Freedom ..................................................................................................... 44
   Conclusion ................................................................................................................................................ 49

2. The Vicarious Humanity of the Son: Ontological over External ................................................................. 52
   The Latin Heresy ....................................................................................................................................... 54
   Christ’s Person and Work ............................................................................................................................ 58
   Vicarious Humanity .................................................................................................................................. 63
   Christ is our Righteousness ........................................................................................................................ 70
   Justified by Faith ....................................................................................................................................... 77
   Conclusion ................................................................................................................................................ 85

3. Drawn to Participate by the Holy Spirit: Objective over Subjective ............................................................ 87
   The Spirit of Christ ...................................................................................................................................... 88
   Our Human Response ................................................................................................................................. 94
   Works and Final Judgement ....................................................................................................................... 102
   Knowledge and Experience ......................................................................................................................... 108
   Theosis .................................................................................................................................................. 115
   Conclusion ................................................................................................................................................ 121
PART TWO: SANCTIFICATION AND HUMAN PARTICIPATION ..................................................124

4. Christ is our Holiness: Objective over Subjective ..................................................125
   The Absence of Emphasis on the Subjective Nature of Sanctification ..................127
   The Indicatives of Grace as Prior to the Imperatives of Law .............................130
   The Inseparability of Justification and Sanctification in Christ ..........................133
   The Holy Spirit as the Means by whom we Participate in Christ ......................137
   Conclusion .............................................................................................................139

5. Growing up into Christ: Ontological over External ..............................................143
   The Eschatological Reserve created by Christ’s Ascension ..............................144
   The Eschatological Orientation of the Risen Humanity of Christ ......................149
   Confidence in Christ ..........................................................................................158
   Conclusion .............................................................................................................160

6. Fixing our eyes on Jesus: Filial over Federal ......................................................166
   Incurvatus In Se .................................................................................................168
   Excurvatus Ex Se ..............................................................................................170
   Transformed by the Renewing of the Mind .......................................................172
   Sharing by the Spirit in the Son’s Communion with the Father .......................176
   Conclusion .............................................................................................................180

Conclusion ..............................................................................................................184

Bibliography ............................................................................................................191
Declarations

I, Alexandra Radcliff, hereby certify that this thesis, which is approximately 80 000 words in length, has been written by me, that it is the record of work carried out by me and that it has not been submitted in any previous application for a higher degree. I was admitted as a research student in September 2010 and as a candidate for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy in April 2011; the higher study for which this is a record was carried out in the University of St Andrews between 2010 and 2013.

Date: ___________________________ Signature of candidate: ___________________________

I hereby certify that the candidate has fulfilled the conditions of the Resolution and Regulations appropriate for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy in the University of St Andrews and that the candidate is qualified to submit this thesis in application for that degree.

Date: ___________________________ Signature of supervisor: ___________________________

In submitting this thesis to the University of St Andrews I understand that I am giving permission for it to be made available for use in accordance with the regulations of the University Library for the time being in force, subject to any copyright vested in the work not being affected thereby. I also understand that the title and the abstract will be published, and that a copy of the work may be made and supplied to any bona fide library or research worker, that my thesis will be electronically accessible for personal or research use unless exempt by award of an embargo as requested below, and that the library has the right to migrate my thesis into new electronic forms as required to ensure continued access to the thesis. I have obtained any third-party copyright permissions that may be required in order to allow such access and migration, or have requested the appropriate embargo below. The following is an agreed request by candidate and supervisor regarding the electronic publication of this thesis: Access to printed copy and electronic publication of thesis through the University of St Andrews.

Date: ___________________________ Signature of candidate: ___________________________

Signature of supervisor: ___________________________
Abstract

This thesis critically engages with the Torrances’ claim that all of humanity is in Christ. It explores how God has claimed humanity in salvation and the claim that He has placed upon humanity in sanctification. It argues that this claim upon humanity is not a cumbersome one, for God’s radically objective act of salvation is the basis for the subjective outworking of the Christian life. As we freely participate by the Spirit in the incarnate Son’s filial relationship with the Father, we grow into the ontological reality of who we are in Christ. Part One critically examines how the salvation wrought for us by the triune God of grace is filial, ontological and objective. It challenges soteriologies that have an overarching federal or external framework which lead to people being thrown back upon their own subjective endeavours to gain salvation. Part Two extends the implications of the Torrances’ soteriology to the outworking of our sanctification. It roots sanctification objectively with justification in Christ, challenging the belief that, having been justified by God, it is now our part to work out our own sanctification. Affirming humanity’s new eschatological orientation in the risen humanity of Christ, it argues for confidence in the nature of our humanity and in the outworking of sanctification. Thus it challenges external paradigms that can only offer a poor perspective on humanity and demand our own ineffectual efforts. It presents the outworking of sanctification in dynamic, relational terms, rather than static, moralistic terms, as the free gift of participating by the Spirit in the Son’s intimate communion with the Father.
Acknowledgements

I am exceedingly grateful to my supervisor, Prof. Alan Torrance, whose graciousness opened my eyes to the truth of the Gospel, and whose support surpasses my thesis to pastoral aid and plumbing advice too! With his positive encouragement, he has given me the space to grow.

This project was made possible and enhanced by generous financial support. I am most thankful to St. Mary’s College for the Donald M. Baillie Scholarship in Theology. I am also grateful to Gladstones Library for the scholarship to study in Wales and to Fondation Catholique Ecossaise for the bursary to study at Institut Catholique in Paris.

I am thankful to my local church in St. Andrews for employment as an outreach youth leader. The local residents of St. Andrews, particularly Phil Gould, David Crowe and the Redpath family, are the reason I remained after my undergraduate studies. I was also blessed to be a part of the Wellsprings community when I moved to Edinburgh. They truly demonstrate the Father’s filial purposes for humanity and the freedom that we have in Christ by the Spirit.

I am also grateful for the support of all my friends and family in Great Britain and the USA, particularly my mother, Celia, who read through the whole of this thesis, and my father, Nick, who defies logico-causal categories with his immense peace and joy in the midst of adversity. I am immeasurably thankful for the support of my wonderful husband, Jason, whom I met and fell in love with as we both embarked upon our doctoral studies in Torrance theology. His steadfast love is a beautiful reflection of God’s covenantal faithfulness.

Finally, I am thankful to the triune God of grace that this thesis has not been a burdensome endeavour but an enjoyable one, as is fitting to its content!
Introduction

Thomas F. Torrance (1913-2007) and James B. Torrance (1923-2003) assert the radical claim that all of humanity is in Christ. All of humanity is chosen by God the Father for salvation in Christ. All of humanity is redeemed by Christ’s vicarious person and work. Humanity is wholly claimed in Christ prior to anything that we can contribute. This also places a total claim upon humanity; God’s grace demands our all. Yet sanctification is not a daunting, arduous endeavour. We are liberated to grow into the ontological reality of who we are in Christ as we freely share by the Spirit in the incarnate Son’s intimate communion with the Father.

The abiding relevance of the Torrances’ theology is made evident when considering the tremendous burden placed on people by preaching and teaching that, whether blatantly or subtly, throws people back upon themselves to earn their relationship with God and try to achieve by their own efforts the kind of person that they ought to be. Gary Deddo observes, ‘Despite the pattern of biblical teaching which begins with God and his faithfulness, we feel the pressure to preach and teach and motivate folks to obedience by addressing the naked will with raw commandments.’ David W. Torrance considers, ‘Probably the great majority of sermons preached are telling people what to do’. The Christian identity tends to be defined in terms of “Yes, I made a decision for Christ” or “I follow the teachings of Jesus” or “I attend church regularly”. This emphasis upon our own, independent religious activity leads to ‘frustration, failure and a lack of the real joy of the Lord’. ‘Because of this focus on ourselves,’ David W. Torrance regrets, ‘there is frequently in the Christian life a lack of assurance of salvation so that we are not really set free to serve’. The remedy to this situation is the Torrances’ claim that our being and action is irreducibly bound up with Christ. Gerrit Scott Dawson asserts, ‘Such theology is a tonic for weariness to those who are labouring in the Church.’

---

A Contentious Claim

The claim that all of humanity is in Christ is a contentious one. Pointing back to the uproar and resistance caused by Martin Luther’s proclamation of justification by faith, T.F. considers, ‘I find this kind of disturbance again and again in the reaction not only of people outside the Church, but even of would-be evangelical people within the membership of Church, for their refusal to accept unconditional grace seems to be due to the fact that it cuts so deeply into the quick of their souls.’ T.F. recounts the story of a parishioner who refused to accept his preaching of unconditional grace. The parishioner protested, “Do you mean to say that although I have been an elder for forty years, that does not count at all for my salvation?” T.F. replied, “It is not what we are or do, but what Christ alone has done and continues to do for us as our Lord and Saviour, that counts. It is by his grace alone that we are put in the right with God, and by his grace alone that we are saved, and live day by day as Christians.” Yet the parishioner still could not accept that his religious activity did not contribute to his salvation. God’s radical unconditional grace can be challenging to receive because it is the denial of our own contribution to salvation and it also lays a great claim upon our lives. T.F. asserts,

---

Without any doubt the gospel of unconditional grace is very difficult for us, for it is so costly. It takes away from under our feet the very ground on which we want to stand, and the free will which we as human beings cherish so dearly becomes exposed as a subtle form of self-will – no one is free to escape from his self-will. It is the costliness of unconditional grace that people resent.

A Liberating Claim

Yet to those who do receive God’s unconditional grace, it is liberating. God’s prior claim of us in Christ sets us free to enjoy our salvation, rather than endeavouring to obtain it. T.F. explains, ‘Because he came as man to take our place, in and through his humanity our humanity is radically transformed, and we become truly human and really free to believe, love and serve him. That is the wonderful message of the Cross and resurrection.’ T.F. writes, ‘It is in this message of the unconditional grace and vicarious humanity of the Lord Jesus Christ that people have often told me that they have found the healing and liberation that they never thought possible.’

An example of this healing and liberation is offered by David W. Torrance, the younger brother of T.F. and J.B. He was ministering to a man who was trying and failing to work up enough faith and repentance in order to receive salvation. D.W.T. said to him, “What you have to learn is to do nothing at all! ...When Christ said on the cross ‘It is finished’, he was saying ‘I have done everything for your salvation. There is nothing left for 8 T.F.T., ‘My Parish Ministry: Alyth, 1940-43’ in Jock Stein ed., Gospel, Church, and Ministry: Thomas F. Torrance Collected Studies I (Eugene: Pickwick Publications, 2012), 40. D.W.T. recalls T.F.’s ministry in Alyth: ‘His stress was upon the unconditional grace of the Lord Jesus Christ. They were called by God freely to accept as a gift his loving offer of salvation without which we are lost. Undoubtedly, this disturbed many of the congregation, as it disturbed many in his next congregation of Beechgrove in Aberdeen and many of his future students. It is often hard for good hardworking Kirk folk to accept that what they do does not avail for salvation.’ D.W.T., ‘Thomas Forsyth Torrance: Minister of the Gospel, Pastor, and Evangelical Theology’ in Elmer Colyer ed., The Promise of Trinitarian Theology: Theologians in Dialogue with T. F. Torrance (Lanham: Rowman & Littlefield, 2001), 14.

---

10 Ibid.

you to do. Your salvation is complete and assured. The only thing left for you to do is simply to say Thank You! And then go on saying Thank You!’”\(^{12}\) D.W.T. reflects how the good news of God’s claim upon humanity in Christ liberated this man from his own efforts so that he could freely and joyfully offer himself back to God: ‘As the man listened, a spirit of relief came over him. His face relaxed. The struggle was over. I think he laughed. The worry and stress was over in the joyful recognition that Christ had done everything. He knew his salvation was assured. He was now for the first time set free to serve God.’\(^{13}\)

J.B. recalls the story of a Pentecostal minister who had grown weary from his own religious efforts over the years. When he learnt from J.B. of God’s unconditional grace, he was liberated from his own endeavours to depend upon Christ.\(^{14}\) Alasdair Heron reflects,

James Torrance has the rare gift of enabling the simplest parishioners, the most perplexed theological students to sense that they are fledglings destined and called to fly in the atmosphere of the eternal grace of God. The warm humanity of his personality is not only a natural gift; it is the radiation of conviction, the conviction of one who knows himself to be constrained by the love of Christ and can therefore do none other than express and convey this witness to others as both claim and liberation.\(^{15}\)

The Influence of the Torrances

The Torrances’ theology exercises considerable influence.\(^{16}\) Alister McGrath considers, ‘Thomas Forsyth Torrance is widely regarded, particularly outside Great Britain, as the most

---

\(^{13}\) Ibid., 19-20.

\(^{16}\) This thesis is concerned with their essential soteriological message of claim and liberation and their influence in this regard. However, their extensive ecumenical endeavours must also be noted, as well as T.F.’s work in theology and science. J.B. was Chairman of the international conversations between the World Alliance of Reformed Churches and the Lutheran World Federation, Chairman of the British Council of Churches’ Commission on the Trinity, and Chairman of the Joint Commission on Doctrine of the Church of Scotland and the Scottish Roman Catholic Church. T.F. most notably significant British academic theologian of the twentieth century....’ 17 T.F. published prolifically and his writing has had a great influence on people’s lives. As Elmer Colyer testifies, ‘Often in my study of Torrance’s work I have found myself on my knees coram deo lost in wonder, praise and thanksgiving to the glorious Triune God, overwhelmed by the power and grandeur of the Gospel. I find myself personally and theologically transformed...’. 18 Dawson writes of the impact upon him of both of the Torrances’ work:

From the moment I was re-introduced to the work of the Torrances several years ago, something ignited in my soul. As I read, I felt like I held gold in my hands. Simultaneously, a hunger awoke and was satisfied. Ever was I directed to see a God higher and more wonderful than I had dared to imagine. Jesus Christ appeared to me through their words in the splendour of his glory and his all-embracing love.19 18 Elmer Colyer, ‘Recollections and Reflections’, Participatio Volume 1 (2009), 18. McGrath hails him as ‘one of the most prolific of theological writers’: ‘by the time of his retirement in 1979, Torrance had authored, edited or translated more than 360 pieces; since his retirement, he has added more than 250 further items to this already impressive list’. McGrath, T.F. Torrance, xi.

19 Dawson, ‘Introduction’, 1. Cf. ‘On this issue of “unconditional grace,” where both have been so criticised by evangelicals in the U.K. and the U.S.A., they have frequently seen conversions to Christ, both through their lecturing and their writing.’ D.W.T., ‘Thomas Forsyth Torrance’, 27.
Although J.B.’s publications are fewer, he had a profound impact upon his students and others.

‘There was more light in his lectures than I imagined possible,’ reflects C. Baxter Kruger.

The Torrances’ influence continues through their students. Kruger’s popular books have made J.B.’s theology accessible to a wide audience. Colyer testifies of lives transformed by teaching T.F.’s theology:

Over many years of teaching T. F. Torrance’s theology, and not least his understanding of the incarnational atoning reconciliation, I have repeatedly witnessed seminary students’, pastors’ and lay persons’ Christian lives transformed as a result of encountering Torrance’s vision of the incarnate saviour.

The Torrances’ theology has even played a significant role in the transformation of a denomination, Grace Communion International, formerly The Worldwide Church of God.

---

20 Although J.B. only published one book, Worship, Community and the Triune God of Grace, it continues to be reprinted and has sold a considerable number of copies, according to personal conversation with his son, Alan J. Torrance. It is unfortunate that J.B.’s theology has at times been confused with T.F.’s or even marginalised. For example, T.F. is mistakenly named as the author of J.B.’s book in the bibliography of Robert Webber, Ancient-Future Faith (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1999). Another example can be seen in the title of the 2013 Conference of the New Evangelical Theological Symposium: ‘Worship, Spirit and the Triune of God of Grace: The Trinitarian Relational Theology of T.F. Torrance’. This plays upon the title of J.B.’s book whilst engaging with T.F. rather than J.B.

The Influence upon the Torrances

The Torrances’ theology is grounded in the revelation of God in Christ, the Scriptures and the Christian tradition. Dawson writes, ‘They speak a daring, vital word that springs first from Scripture, then rises through the great Patristic writers, the creeds, the Reformers, and the evangelical theologians who have followed.’\(^{25}\) The Torrances draw upon patristic theology, especially for T.F., Athanasius and Cyril of Alexandria. They stand within the Reformed tradition and follow Reformers such as John Calvin and John Knox. They particularly admire John McLeod Campbell, whose teaching on universal atonement and assurance led to his deposition from ministry in the Church of Scotland.\(^{26}\) They were both personally influenced in their time by studying abroad under Karl Barth and by their studies in Edinburgh.\(^{27}\) J.B. was particularly influenced there by John MacMurray and Norman Kemp Smith.\(^{28}\) T.F. records the personal influence of his teachers, Daniel Lamont, William Manson and, most of all, Hugh Ross Mackintosh.\(^{29}\)

Shaped by their upbringing within a missionary family, the Torrances have strongly practical concerns to their theology. Their brother, D.W.T., reflects,

We were all three greatly influenced by our missionary parents, their dependence on the Word of God and prayer. They imparted to us their missionary concerns. Theology is the servant of ministry. If it does not lead us to personal faith in Jesus Christ in the unity of his person and work, then, as Tom often said, “our theology is only a paper theology”.\(^{30}\)

---

\(^{25}\) Dawson, ‘Introduction’, 4. Heron reflects, ‘...James Torrance made no claim to be ‘original’ or to break fresh ground in academic theology. He was concerned far more to bear witness to the abiding foundation of all Christian faith as the promise leading us forward to the Kingdom of God.’ Heron, ‘James Torrance’, 5.

\(^{27}\) Barth hoped for T.F. to be his successor in the chair of dogmatics at Basel, although T.F. declined in order not to uproot his family from Scotland. McGrath, T.F. Torrance, 102-3.

\(^{28}\) According to personal conversation with his son, Alan J. Torrance.

Both T.F. and J.B. chose to enter the ordained ministry as well as have academic careers. Their theology is intimately related to pastoral concerns. D.W.T. writes of T.F.:

Tom was never primarily an academic theologian. He was primarily a churchman and pastor with a pastor’s concern for the spiritual renewal of the church. It was out of his pastoral concern for the renewal of the church that he felt led — or compelled — into the academic world in order to try and forward that concern. His theology as a biblical theologian was centered on the saving, Triune grace of God centered in the person and work of Christ, that grace which in Christ changes and transforms lives.

Heron writes of J.B.:

James Torrance is not and never was a cloistered academic, but a pastor, a guide for the perplexed, a man of faith whose goal and interest was above all the nurturing and guiding of others in the way of that same faith. Theological reflection, theological writing and theological teaching are for him firmly anchored in (and related to) the community of faith, a community far wider and broader than the purely academic. Theology as he understands and practices it is both existential and ecclesiastical. It is not merely a matter of dusty books or rarified ideas or brilliant theories; it is a personal quest and responsibility in the service of the Church, and as such involves not only the mind but also the heart of the theological teacher.

The Torrances’ pastoral and practical concerns mean that their theology truly engages with people’s needs and transforms lives.

The Influence upon this Thesis

The Torrances’ theology cannot be critically engaged from an Archimedean point. It must be acknowledged that this thesis is shaped by questions which arise from standing within the Pentecostal-Charismatic movement. These questions will be distinct from ones which arise from the Torrances’ own Reformed tradition. This thesis concurs with T.F. in some of his criticism of the Pentecostal-Charismatic movement but also suggests how particular Pentecostal-Charismatic concerns might complement the Torrances’ theology. This will be seen in the suggestion that Pentecostal-Charismatic experience might be considered a logical consequence of being drawn by the Spirit to participate in Christ’s communion with the Father. A distinctively Pentecostal-Charismatic influence can also be seen in the argument for greater confidence in the eschatological orientation of our humanity in Christ. However, the Pentecostal-Charismatic movement has its own shortcomings in that it can tend towards contractual relations with God.34 Therefore, it would benefit from the main concern of this thesis, which is that the Torrances show us how humanity’s claim in Christ means liberation from our own religious efforts.

---

32 D.W.T., Interview, 28. T.F.’s experience as a padre during the War was also formative in this regard: ‘...his personal conversations with men facing danger and death, crystallized with greater intensity in his mind the necessity for a Christian faith that related to real life, a faith that could stand all the stresses and strains of life, and bring comfort and deliverance in Christ to the living and the dying’. D.W.T., ‘Thomas Forsyth Torrance’, 17.
33 Heron, ‘James Torrance’, 2.

The Scope of the Thesis

Part One of this thesis examines the Torrances’ filial, ontological and objective understanding of salvation. It challenges soteriologies that have an overarching federal or external framework, which lead to people being thrown back upon their own subjective endeavours to gain salvation. Chapter One explores how God is revealed in Christ as a covenantal God, not a contractual God, with primarily filial rather than judicial purposes for humanity. Prior to any contribution that we could make, He chooses all of humanity for salvation in Christ. This challenges the Federal Calvinist doctrines of double predestination and limited atonement. It also raises the questions of whether universal atonement leads to universalism and whether God’s claim of humanity in Christ negates our human freedom. Chapter Two explores how all of humanity is saved by the person and work of Christ. This challenges external, forensic and ethical models of the atonement that cannot offer a true transformation of humanity and which throw us back upon our own endeavours. It questions what it means to share in Christ’s righteousness and what it means to be justified by faith. Chapter Three explores what place the Holy Spirit and humanity have in this objective, Christocentric scheme of salvation. It presents the Spirit’s role as drawing humanity to participate in Christ’s intimate communion with the Father.

Therefore it challenges accounts of the Spirit whereby humanity is given an autonomous, logico-causal role in redemption, whether in our response of faith or through works in anticipation of final judgement. It also addresses the questions of whether salvation is reduced to a noetic concept and whether the Holy Spirit and humanity have diminished roles.

Part Two extends the implications of the Torrances’ soteriology to the outworking of our sanctification. Chapter Four roots sanctification objectively with justification in Christ and presents the outworking of sanctification as our participation by the Spirit in Christ’s holiness. This challenges the belief that, having been justified by God, it is now our responsibility to work out our own sanctification. In particular it challenges the notion of a Federal second work or Pentecostal second blessing whereby sanctification is made subsequent to justification in the ordo salutis and people are thrown back upon their own resources to attempt to achieve it themselves. It also engages with the questions of whether our participation in Christ entails a loss of creaturely being or of our own human response. Chapter Five argues for confidence in the outworking of our sanctification on account of our new eschatological orientation in the risen humanity of Christ. It addresses the charge of triumphalism and arrogance and challenges perspectives of resignation to sinfulness and a life of struggle. Chapter Six questions the nature of sin, repentance and holiness. It challenges static, moralistic ethics and argues for a liberating understanding of the outworking of sanctification in dynamic, relational terms of participating by the Spirit in the Son’s intimate communion with the Father. The Conclusion revisits the key issues and arguments and offers possible avenues for further exploration.
Part One:
The Triune God of Grace and Salvation
The purpose of Part One of this thesis is to examine the Torrances’ filial, ontological and objective soteriology. This first chapter explores how God the Father is revealed in His Son as a covenantal God, not a contractual God, with primarily filial rather than judicial purposes for humanity. Prior to any contribution that we could make, He chooses all of humanity for salvation in Christ.

This soteriology led the Torrances into conflict with Federal Calvinism, the prevailing preaching and teaching of their Scottish Reformed tradition in their time. According to Federal Calvinism, God created Adam to discern the laws of nature by reason. God made a covenant with Adam as the ‘federal’ head of the human race. If Adam was obedient, God would give Him eternal life; if he was disobedient, it would lead to death. Adam disobeyed the law and, as federal head of the human race, his curse affected all of humanity. However, out of His love, God made a new covenant, electing some to be saved by Christ. In order to forgive humanity, God had to satisfy his righteousness and justice. Christ therefore became a penal substitutionary sacrifice to atone for the sins of the elect.¹ This Federal scheme is expressed confessionally in the Irish Articles and in the Westminster Confession of Faith.²

---

² Ibid., 44.
The Torrances believe that Federal theology is a distortion of Calvin’s theology. J.B. argues that the Federal doctrine of election presents God’s relationship with humanity in contractual terms, which is foreign to Calvin’s teaching of one eternal covenant of grace. ‘Old’ and ‘new’ do not denote two different covenants; they are two forms of the one eternal covenant. Federal Calvinism presents a covenant of works for all and a covenant of grace only for the elect. This means that God is related to all of humanity in terms of law, but only to some in terms of grace. Primacy is given to law over grace. J.B. considers, ‘In the federal scheme, the focus of attention moves away from what Christ has done for us and for all humanity to what we have to do if we would be (or know that we are) in covenant with God.’ He observes that this leads to a lack of assurance regarding salvation and people turning inward upon themselves to examine whether they are bearing enough ‘fruit’ as evidence of their salvation.

The Torrances’ soteriological arguments are important because Federal Calvinism has an abiding authority today. It currently governs the North American Reformed perspective and ‘is considered, by many, to be the only orthodox Reformed theology acceptable’. Federal theology has had a history of dominance in the perspective of those wishing to adhere to Calvinism.

Yet Federal theology is not the only expression of Calvinism. Charles Partee distinguishes between three kinds of Calvinism:

(I) Conservative Calvinists, represented by Charles Hodge and his sympathizers, advance Scripture alone emphasizing its divinity before its humanity; (II) Liberal Calvinists, represented by Friedrich Schleiermacher and his sympathizers, advance faith alone emphasizing its subjectivity before its object; and (III)

---

4 Ibid.
9 Ibid., 4.
Evangelical Calvinists, represented by Karl Barth and his sympathizers, advance Christ alone emphasizing his person before his work.'

Conservative Calvinism, represented by Charles Hodge, Louis Berkhof, Richard Muller, the Canons of Dort (1618-9) and the Westminster Confession (1648), seeks to be a faithful follower of Calvin. The liberal Calvinists, driven by the challenge of contemporary issues, do not wish to be so restricted. Myk Habets and Bobby Grow, two advocates of ‘Evangelical Calvinism’, propose a third way. They wish to follow Calvin but are not so concerned with getting ‘back to’ Calvin, on the grounds of ecclesia reformata, semper reformanda.

The Torrances have been grouped into this ‘Evangelical Calvinism’, along with figures such as Thomas Erskine, Edward Irving, John McLeod Campbell and Karl Barth. This ‘alternative Calvinism’ has the vicarious humanity of Christ, and union with Christ, at its centre. It is said to be in continuity with John Knox and the Scots Confession of 1560, and in contention with the Synod of Dort, the Westminster Assembly and Federal theology.

There is much debate as to whether Federal Calvinism is faithful to Calvin. The most important question, however, is whether Federal theology is faithful to the truth of the gospel. Indeed, A.T.B. McGowan, who disagrees with J.B.’s criticism of Federal theology, considers that the ‘crux’ of J.B.’s argument does not concern a perceived lack of faithfulness to Calvin but rather ‘a misunderstanding of the nature of a Biblical covenant’.\(^\text{18}\) For the Torrances, the essential difficulty with Federal Calvinism is that it distorts the nature of who God is, resulting in a misunderstanding of how God relates to us in salvation. Lack of assurance in salvation and weariness from trying to obtain it can be remedied by a true understanding of God.

This chapter begins by looking to the nature of the Father.\(^\text{19}\) God’s self-revelation in Christ challenges Federal theology’s contractual God who relates to humanity chiefly in judicial terms. God is a covenant God whose purposes for humanity are primarily filial. This challenges a Federal doctrine of predestination, whereby God chooses some for salvation and others for reprobation. God chooses all of humanity for salvation in Christ. God’s all-encompassing grace also defies the Federal doctrine of limited atonement. However, universal atonement raises the question of whether this equates to the doctrine of universalism; and God’s sovereignty raises the question of whether this negates human freedom. For the Torrances, however, God’s grace cannot be understood according to logico-causal categories constructed by human reasoning. The irrational mystery of sin means that some people choose to reject God. Yet we are only able to make a free choice for God because of His prior decision for us. God’s unconditional, covenantal grace does not negate human freedom, but rather truly establishes it. In this way, the Torrances offer an abiding answer to the problems of doubt and burnout: Only God’s radical claiming of all humanity in Christ can liberate us from the burden of endeavouring to obtain our own salvation and give us assurance that we are already included in His universal covenant of grace.

Who over how

‘Who’ over ‘how’

In order to understand how God acts in salvation, it is necessary to first ask who God is. This is the priority of the ‘who’ question over the ‘how’ question, which Dietrich Bonhoeffer

---

\(^{19}\) As a Trinitarian God, it will be necessary to also include reference to the Son and the Spirit, although they will be given fuller attention in the chapters that follow.
wrote of in Christology. He argues that Christology cannot be equated with soteriology. Christ cannot be known from his works. Rather, we understand God’s works from knowing the person of Christ, who is the revelation of God the Father. We must therefore look to who God is in order to understand how he acts.

This is the starting point for the Torrances. J.B. refers directly to Bonhoeffer’s prioritization of asking ‘who’. J.B. perceives that if we do not begin there, and allow our understanding to be shaped by God’s self-revelation through His Son, we project anthropological notions onto God which have damaging consequences for how we understand salvation. He argues, ‘Our dogmatic starting point in theology should be: Who is God?’ Correspondingly, T.F. argues that we cannot seek to understand God according to prior anthropological systems of logic. The method of knowing in theology must be appropriate to the subject of enquiry. God determines our knowledge of Him and we are dependent upon His self-giving revelation.

Knowledge of this God cannot be moulded according to our plastic ideas or controlling archetypes; that would be idolatry. Rather must our knowing of God be brought into conformity with what He reveals of Himself, and under the control of what He gives us of Himself.

Revelation through the Son

For the Torrances, we know who God the Father is according to His self-giving revelation through the incarnation of His Son. T.F. describes this revelation as God ‘objectifying’ Himself in Christ. Jesus is able to show us who God is because he is homoousios tō Patri [of one being with the Father]. As Jesus said, “I and the Father are one” (John 10:30); “Anyone who has seen me has seen the Father” (John 14:9); “No one knows the Father except the Son and those to whom the Son chooses to reveal him” (Matt. 11:27). Of one being with

21 Ibid.
22 J.B.T., Worship, 58.
24 J.B.T., Worship, 58.
26 Ibid., 37.
27 Ibid., 29; 37; 43; 45.
29 Scriptural references come from the English Standard Version.
the Father, Jesus is the very expression of the Father’s heart. There is no difference in their mercy or love. Jesus is not the kinder side of a God who is also a wrathful Father. As T.F. would often assert, ‘There is no God behind the back of Jesus.’

God and Christ, the Father and the Son, are one in their being and nature – there is no God behind the back of Jesus Christ. As the one Mediator between God and Man who is himself both God and Man, Christ cannot be thought of in some intermediate way, as coming in between us and the wrath of God, or as changing God or making him merciful. Jesus Christ is God incarnate; what God is in Christ he ever was and is in himself. Christ’s coming among us in the likeness of sinful flesh, in the likeness of flesh as it is in us sinners, in order to condemn sin in the flesh and reconcile us to God, is the very movement and expression of the Love of God.

‘Filial’ over ‘judicial’

On the basis of God’s self-revelation in Christ, the nineteenth-century minister, John Mcleod Campbell, sought to promote a filial understanding of the atonement over a judicial understanding. The judicial categories of the Federal Calvinism of his time had led to a lack of joy, peace and assurance in salvation among his congregation in the parish of Rhu, Scotland. Looking instead to God’s self-revelation in Christ, McLeod Campbell saw grounds for their assurance, joy and peace. Jesus’ activity in salvation is one with the Father. The Son was not placating the wrath of the Father in order to receive forgiveness for humanity. The reconciliation that Jesus brings about is the very expression of the love of the Father. For Mcleod Campbell, this does not deny a judicial element to atonement, but it means that it must be subsumed and only understood within God’s overarching filial purposes for humanity.

---

31 Ibid., xvi; T.F.T., Scottish Theology, 294.
32 T.F.T, Scottish Theology, 294.
The Torrances admire and advance McLeod Campbell’s concern to promote the ‘filial’ over the ‘judicial’. They believe that, when we look to who God is through Christ, we see that the Father’s dealings with humanity in salvation are primarily filial rather than judicial. They were therefore critical of their tradition’s Westminster Confession of Faith for having an overarching judicial framework. T.F. believes that this distorts the nature of the Father, presenting Him primarily as a Judge and Lawgiver and only a Father to those who satisfy the requirements of the Law. If you begin with a concept of God as Lawgiver, J.B. considers, you will understand salvation in terms of God being conditioned into being gracious by human works or by Christ satisfying the conditions of the law. However, if you begin with the God revealed by Jesus as the triune God of grace, you will see His unconditional filial purposes whereby He draws us as His sons into communion with Him. Scripture speaks of God’s intention ‘to bring many sons to glory’ (Heb. 2:10; cf. Eph. 1:5). J.B. asserts, ‘...God’s primary purpose for humanity is ‘filial’, not just ‘judicial’, where we have been created in the image of God to find our true being-in-communion, in ‘sonship’, in the mutual personal relations of love.

J.B. also perceives that a legal framework leads to a distortion of our understanding of humanity. He writes, ‘The federal scheme has substituted a legal understanding of man for a filial. That is, God’s prime purpose for man is legal, not filial, but this yields an impersonal view of man as the object of justice, rather than as primarily the object of love.’ J.B. considers that the Federal scheme sees humanity more as workers than as sons: ‘What our doctrine of God is, that is our anthropology. The counterpart of the contract God of the covenant of works is the individual with his / her legal rights – and a work ethic! The counterpart of the triune God of grace is the human person created for communion.’ This resonates with the parable of the prodigal son, in which the father forgives his son before he has even had a chance to repent, and does not wish for his son to relate to him in terms of work and servanthood, but welcomes him back as family (Luke 15:11-31). The problem with an overarching legal framework is that it demands works from humanity for salvation. An overarching filial framework declares that God has created humanity for communion. The Torrances believe that the Father’s dealings with us are not primarily in terms of law but rather in terms of Fatherhood and sonship.

35 T.F., Scottish Theology, 293-312.
36 Ibid., 128-33.
40 Ibid.

Conclusion

In considering how God acts in salvation, it is necessary to first ask who God is. We know who the Father is according to His self-giving revelation in the incarnation of His Son. Of one being with the Father, the Son is able to reveal the nature of the Father. This also means that the Father and the Son are unified in their mission and that the Father’s wrath is not pitted against the Son, conceived of as a kinder side of God. Rather, Jesus is the very expression of the Father’s love for humanity. The Father’s purposes are primarily filial rather than judicial. His love sought our salvation so that we might be adopted as sons in order to live in loving communion with Him. This is of the utmost importance because it speaks to people who lack joy, peace and assurance in salvation.

Covenant versus Contract

Contract

Having considered who God is, it can be better understood how God acts in salvation. For the Torrances, the Father, who is one in His mission with the Son and has primarily filial purposes, had made a covenant with humanity, not a contract. However, the Torrances observe a propensity towards a contractual understanding in the Federal Calvinism within their Scottish Reformed tradition and seek to challenge this by reaffirming God’s gracious covenant.

The Torrances perceive the Westminster Confession and Federal theology to present salvation as a contract. J.B. argues that this is not Scriptural; rather it is a reflection of the structure of seventeenth century society in Britain, France and New England. J.B. defines a contract as ‘a legal relationship in which two people or two parties bind themselves together on mutual conditions to effect some future result’. According to a contractual perspective, salvation depends upon humanity fulfilling certain conditions, rather than upon the grace of God. A contractual perspective is demonstrated when preachers call upon people to repent in order that they might receive forgiveness from God. This makes God’s forgiveness conditional upon repentance. John Calvin calls this ‘legal repentance’. J.B. perceives that this reverses the evangelical order of grace so that repentance is prior to forgiveness. He observes, ‘It makes the imperatives of obedience prior to the indicatives of grace, and regards God’s love and acceptance and forgiveness as conditional upon what we do – upon our meritorious acts of repentance.’ This issue is perpetuated today by forms of evangelical outreach such as the ‘Four Spiritual Laws’ of Campus Crusade for Christ and ‘The 4 Points’, which present salvation in judicial and contractual terms, dependent upon our personal response.

---

41 Ibid.
42 T.F.T., Scottish Theology, 144.

Covenant

The Torrances argue that God does not engage with humanity in contractual terms, but in covenantal terms. A covenant, in Biblical terms, is ‘a promise binding two people or two parties to love one another unconditionally.’ Two kinds of covenant are seen in the Bible: suntheke (bilateral) and diatheke (unilateral). A bilateral covenant is made between two equals, for example, when a man and woman promise to take each other in marriage. A unilateral covenant, however, is made by one party for another. An example of this can be seen in Israel when a king made a covenant for his people, setting out what kind of king he would be and what kind of people they would be. As T.F. considers, God knew that Israel was incapable of fulfilling a bilateral covenant; therefore, He provided a way for Israel to respond to Him. God made a unilateral covenant with Israel, asserting, “I will be your God and you shall be my people.” Israel did not have to fulfil certain conditions to gain God’s

---

47 J.B.T., ‘Covenant or contract?’, 57.
49 See the ‘Four Spiritual Laws’ of Campus Crusade for Christ: http://www.campuscrusade.com/fourlawseng.htm; and ‘The 4 Points’: http://www.the4points.com/INT/about_the4points.php?page=EVA.
50 J.B.T., ‘Covenant Concept’, 228.
51 Ibid., 229.
favour. This was a distinguishing factor from the activity of those who were not the people of Israel. It is this kind of unilateral covenant which the Torrances argue that God has made with humanity. He fulfils both sides of the covenant for our salvation in Christ. J.B. writes, ‘The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ is the God who has made a covenant for us in Christ, binding himself to man and man to himself in Christ...’ T.F. declares the covenant in this way:

God loves you so utterly and completely that he has given himself for you in Jesus Christ his beloved Son, and has thereby pledged his very Being as God for your salvation. In Jesus Christ God has actualised his unconditional love for you in your human nature in such a once for all way, that he cannot go back upon it without undoing the Incarnation and the Cross and thereby denying himself. Jesus Christ died for you precisely because you are sinful and utterly unworthy of him, and has thereby already made you his own before and apart from your ever believing in him. He has bound you to himself by his love in a way that he will never let you go, for even if you refuse him and damn yourself in hell his love will never cease. Therefore, repent and believe in Jesus Christ as your Lord and Saviour.

We are not forgiven if we repent; we are forgiven, therefore we repent. This is what John Calvin calls ‘evangelical repentance’. J.B. draws upon McLeod Campbell’s conviction that Christ vicariously confessed our sin for us. He also points to the parable of the prodigal son who wanted to work his way into his father’s favour, as in legal repentance, but the father accepted him before he even had the opportunity (Luke 15:11-32). In the New Testament, forgiveness precedes repentance. There are no conditions upon humanity to receive salvation. J.B. therefore repeatedly insists, ‘The God of the Bible, the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ is a covenant-God, and not a contract-God.’

---

54 Ibid., 230.
55 T.F.T., Mediation, 94.
56 J.B.T., ‘Covenant or contract?’, 57.
57 Calvin, Institutes, III.2.iii.
58 J.B.T., ‘Christ in our place’, 49.
59 J.B.T., Worship, 57.
60 J.B.T., ‘Covenant or contract?’, 57.
Obligations of Grace

However, this radical belief that God places no conditions upon humanity for salvation has not been received without criticism. It raises the concern that too much grace leads to lawlessness.\textsuperscript{62} This fear has led some to believe that there must be conditions for salvation.

John Coffey proposes that this is the reason why seventeenth century Federal theologian Samuel Rutherford, of whom the Torrances were so critical, taught about the conditionality of the covenant and the importance of preparations. Coffey argues that Federal theologians such as Rutherford held to Calvin’s doctrine of \textit{sola gratia} but, in practice, preaching focused on the necessity of human activity because of the concern that grace leads to a licence to sin.\textsuperscript{63}

A contemporary example of this concern can be seen in the theology of Paul A. Rainbow. He argues that if no conditions are placed upon humanity, this leads to antinomianism. Therefore, God must require certain conditions for salvation.\textsuperscript{64} Rainbow maintains the subtle yet important distinction that works are not simply the outworking of initial justification, as held by the Reformers, but an instrumental ground for final justification.\textsuperscript{65} He draws upon E.P. Sanders’ argument that, for Paul, obedience to the law is a condition for staying in the covenant. For Rainbow, we must fulfil the ‘dual condition’ of faith and obedience.\textsuperscript{66}

Christian obedience may be called a sub-condition for the culminating moment of justification. It is a second condition in its own right besides faith, because God requires holiness just as surely as he requires faith for our salvation, and will use good works at the judgment as the index of faith’s authenticity.\textsuperscript{67}

However, Rutherford and Rainbow demonstrate a fundamental misunderstanding of grace and law. Certainly, their concern to uphold ethical behaviour is commendable. Paul is clear \textsuperscript{62} ‘JBT’s exposition of this invariably gave rise to [the] concern, namely, that such a theology of grace risked weakening or diluting the force of the law thereby opening the door to a liberal if not licentious attitude towards our God-given obligations.’ Alan J. Torrance, ‘The Bible as Testimony to Our Belonging: The Theological Vision of James B. Torrance’, Gerrit Scott Dawson ed., \textit{An Introduction to Torrance Theology: Discovering the Incarnate Saviour} (London: T&T Clark, 2007), 107.

\textsuperscript{65} Ibid., 264. This belief will be examined in more detail in chapter three.
\textsuperscript{66} Ibid., 206.
\textsuperscript{67} Ibid.
that we do not have a licence to sin: ‘What shall we say, then? Shall we go on sinning so that grace may increase? By no means! We are those who have died to sin; how can we live in it any longer?’ (Rom. 6:1-2; cf. 6:15). Yet Paul is also emphasising that grace leads to the end of sin. Perhaps, therefore, the erosion of Christian behaviour is not due to the teaching of unconditional grace, as Rainbow suggests, but actually because it is not being taught. For Rainbow to include obedience as a condition for salvation is to keep us under the law. Paul asserts that sin abounds under the law (Rom 5:20). It is more plausible that the disobedience which Rainbow perceives is actually a result of teaching law. The very thing that Rainbow seeks to use to discourage disobedience perversely fuels it.

Rather, it is God’s unconditional grace that leads to living a holy life which upholds the law. Paul writes that it is under grace that sin has no dominion (Rom. 6:14). Grace teaches us to reject ungodliness:

For the grace of God has appeared that offers salvation to all people. It teaches us to say “No” to ungodliness and wordly passions, and to live self-controlled, upright and godly lives in this present age, while we wait for the blessed hope – the appearing of the glory of our great God and Saviour, Jesus Christ, who gave himself for us to redeem us from all wickedness and to purify for himself a people that are his very own, eager to do what is good (Tit. 2:11-14).

Paul asserts that we are free from the law and that Godly living is a fruit of the Spirit (Gal. 5). Godly living fulfils the law but this is the fruit of the Spirit rather than our own efforts; thus we cannot boast of anything but the cross of Christ (Gal. 6). It is not law but grace that is the only way leading to authentic Christian behaviour.

For the Torrances, there are no conditions placed upon humanity for grace, but there are obligations of grace. The ‘logic of grace’, T.F. believes, is that ‘all of grace’ does not mean nothing of man but rather ‘all of man’. Likewise, J.B. argues that although God makes the covenant for us, it demands a response from us. God’s claim of humanity places a radical claim upon humanity. However, it is essential to distinguish that the obligations of grace are not conditions of grace. J.B. writes,

---

69 J.B.T., ‘Covenant or contract?’, 55.
...God’s grace, which certainly lays costly unconditional claims upon us, is not conditioned by considerations of worth and merit. Repentance, faith and love, are not conditions of grace, but our response to grace, and the way to evoke that response is to hold out to people the love of the Father, the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the promises of the Spirit – and that is the road to assurance.

God is a covenant God, not a contract God; His purposes are primarily filial over legal. J.B. often asserts, ‘...the Indicatives of grace are always prior to the obligations of law and human obedience’. T.F. also situates our response in relation to the fact that God has already provided the perfect human response in our place through Jesus. This means that our response is a participation in a response already made, which liberates humanity from any demands to earn God’s grace and allows us to offer ourselves back to God in freedom. Rutherford and Rainbow are examples of the human propensity to contradict God’s covenant by introducing conditions. As J.B. writes,

The fallacy of legalism in all ages — perhaps this is the tendency of the human heart in all ages — is to turn God’s covenant of grace into a contract, with the most serious consequences for preaching, worship and pastoral counselling. In the Bible, the form of the covenant is such that the Indicatives of grace are always prior to the obligations of law and human obedience. 'I am the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, I have loved you and redeemed you and brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage, therefore keep my commandments.' But legalism puts it the other way round. 'If you keep the law, God will love you! If you keep the Sabbath day and carry the yoke of the Torah, the Kingdom of God will come!' The imperatives are made prior to the indicatives. The covenant has been turned into a contract, and God’s grace made conditional on men’s obedience.

Such a contractual understanding leads to a lack of assurance in salvation and burnout in trying to obtain it. In contrast, the affirmation of God’s unconditional grace grants assurance and a freedom to respond because God has already chosen our salvation and provided a response for us in Christ. Therefore, it is precisely because a response is not demanded for our salvation that this creates a response to our salvation. When a person is

---

71 Ibid., 3-4.
72 Ibid., 1.
75 T.F.T., Mediation, 104.
coerced into a contract, he does not have a true understanding of God’s grace, and cannot respond with such authentic love for God. J.B.’s son, Alan J. Torrance, explains this with an analogy of two husbands who must travel abroad for business. Their wives become concerned at the temptations that may arise on their trip. Margaret says, “John, never forget that if I ever find out that you have so much as nodded in the direction of another woman in the course of your travels, I shall sue you for divorce and ensure that you lose the kids, the house and a substantial portion of your salary, not to mention your reputation...!” On the other hand, Jane says, “David, I would just like you to know that no matter what circumstances you find yourself in and no matter what happens, I shall always be there for you and will always love you. If you make mistakes, never forget that I shall always forgive you!” A.J.T. argues that it is Jane’s unconditional love which inspires a faithful response:

Which of the two husbands is more likely to engage in the aforementioned ‘untheological activities’ during his trip?’ One suspects that it would be John for the simple reason that, as he left, his wife Margaret made it clear that she did not love him unconditionally. Contrary to the commitment inherent in their wedding vows, their relationship was a contractual one. She was, in effect, informing him that she did not really love him at all. The withdrawal of unconditional love could only serve to weaken the obligations that stem from it. The obligations on David were, by contrast, profoundly strengthened – and in a way that was both affirming of him and surely freeing. It would not only intensify the obligatory response but inspire and facilitate it.

Therefore, God’s unconditional covenant of grace does not diminish our legal obligations but actually deeply strengthens them.79

Conclusion

In beginning to explore how God acts in salvation, in light of His filial purposes for humanity as revealed through the Son, we see that He has made a unilateral covenant with us. God has made a covenant for us in Christ, who has offered the perfect response to the Father in our place. Yet the Torrances perceived a conditional, contractual relationship to be preached and taught in the Westminster Confession and Federal theology. It essentially asserts, ‘If

78 Ibid.
79 The argument that grace leads to Godly living raises the question of why Christians still sin. This will be explored in chapter six but, for now, we might affirm that although grace may not always lead to Godly living, it is the only way to Godly living, for the law perversely fuels sin.
you fulfil [a certain condition], then God will save you.’ The Torrances challenge this contractual mindset, reaffirming God’s gracious covenant: ‘God has saved you. Therefore respond.’ This is contested by those who believe that this message of unconditional grace leads to lawlessness. They seek to reintroduce conditions in order to promote lawfulness. Yet this only serves to increase lawlessness. God’s gracious covenant does not diminish our legal obligations but actually strengthens them because we are able to offer ourselves back to God in freedom, knowing that the response has already been made for us in Christ. This is the true basis of assurance of salvation and serving God in a way that does not lead to burnout.

Election is Grace

Election of all

God’s unconditional covenantal grace means, for the Torrances, that all of humanity is elect. Thus they challenge the Federal Calvinist doctrine of predestination, whereby God elects some for salvation and others for damnation. This presents God as relating to only some of humanity in terms of grace. The Torrances argue that this is at odds with God’s unconditional grace and filial purposes for humanity. They believe that God is related to all of humanity in terms of grace and has elected us all for salvation.

However, John Coffey contends that J.B. comes to this idea by reading Calvin through a Barthian lens. Therefore, J.B. does not see that Calvin’s teaching contains ‘the germ-seed’ of Federal theology, which Coffey argues can be seen in Institutes II.9-11.80 Coffey contends that Calvin ‘had no time for the universalist idea that God is equally loving towards all mankind.’81 Coffey argues that God does not relate to all of humanity in grace.

Regardless of J.B.’s interpretation of Calvin, the most significant question concerns whether J.B.’s understanding is a faithful reflection of the truth of God. The Torrances faithfully reflect the Father’s universal love for humanity as witnessed to in Scripture. In the Old Testament, Ezekiel prophesies of God’s redeeming purposes, when He will put in His people a new heart and the Holy Spirit (Ez. 36:25-28). Ezekiel proclaims, “Have I any pleasure that the wicked should die? declares the Sovereign Lord” (Ez. 18:23) and, “For I take no pleasure in the death of anyone, declares the Sovereign Lord. Repent and live!” (Ez. 18:31-32). In the New Testament, 2 Peter 3:9 reveals God’s heart for everyone to repent and be saved from death: ‘The Lord is patient with you, not wanting anyone to perish, but everyone to come to repentance.’ Indeed, God ‘wants all people to be saved and to come to a knowledge of the truth’ (1 Tim. 2:4). Such Scripture seems to testify to the Father relating to all of humanity in love and grace.

A much misunderstood passage in this regard is Romans 9-11. It is often used to support the belief that God elects some for salvation and others for reprobation. This would imply that God only relates to some of humanity in terms of grace. However, T.F. argues that Paul is presenting election in terms of the grace and love of God which is free to all.\(^82\) Paul’s concern is inclusion, not exclusion. Paul is writing of God’s purpose to include the Gentiles, who were excluded, which was controversial for the Jews. Therefore, this passage is not a portrayal of the unfairness of God’s wrath, in choosing some for damnation, but the scandal of God’s radical grace, in choosing all for salvation. Romans 9-11 shows God’s heart to have mercy on all of humanity and His all-encompassing saving purposes. The most convincing witness that God’s election is of all humanity, however, is the heart of the Father revealed in Christ.

Election in Christ

As we look to God’s self-revelation in His Son, we see that humanity’s election is grounded in Christ. Paul wrote to the Ephesians,

> For he chose us in him before the creation of the world to be holy and blameless in his sight. In love he predestined us for adoption to sonship through Jesus Christ, in accordance with his pleasure and will to the praise of his glorious grace, which he has freely given us in the One he loves (Eph. 1:4-6).

Accordingly, J.B. believes that Christ’s mediatorial headship is over all; God the Father sums up all things in Christ (Eph. 1:10).\(^83\) T.F. likewise asserts, ‘How does God elect men? Through Christ. Why does He elect them? Because of Christ.’\(^84\) He writes:

---

\(^82\) T.F.T., ‘Predestination in Christ’, Evangelical Quarterly 13 (1941), 115.
The great fact of the Gospel then is this: that God has actually chosen us in Jesus Christ in spite of our sin, and that in the death of Christ that election has become a fait accompli. It means too that God has chosen all men, in as much as Christ died for all men, and because that is once and for all no one can ever elude the election of His love. In as much as no one exists except by the Word of God by whom all things were made and in whom all things consist, and in as much as this is the Word that has once and for all enacted the eternal election of grace to embrace all men, the existence of every man whether he will or no is bound up inextricably with that election—with the Cross of Jesus Christ.

The difficulty with Federal theology is that election is separated from Christ and this leads to an abstract and deterministic doctrine. Romans 9 is often understood to support a deterministic scheme of election. T.F. argues that this is wrong because the Father’s choice of Jesus makes election supremely personal. He contends that determinism is the result of anthropocentric thinking:

The lapse into determinism is only possible with the employment of abstract categories of thought, such as cause, force, etc. To think of God in this way, through forms of thought that have been shaped through our interpretation of the world, is to drag God down within the abstractions of a fallen world.

This is why it is imperative first of all to consider who God is in order to understand how He acts (the priority of the ‘who’ question over the ‘how’ question). The Torrances argue that the question of election must be guided not by a prior legal or logical framework, as in Federal Calvinism, but by God’s self-revelation of His filial purposes in Christ.

Election is Grace

Election in Christ is grace, for the Torrances. J.B. writes, ‘The doctrine of election, interpreted in this Christological way, enshrines the good news that our salvation is by grace alone, and is from beginning to end the one work of the one God, Father, Son and Holy

---

87 Ibid., 113.
88 Ibid., 114.
Spirit. He chose us, not we him. The doctrine of election is another way of saying that all is of grace.’

J.B. believes that ‘unconditional election’ is another expression of ‘unconditional grace’. When election is understood through Christ, it can be seen that God does not choose some for salvation and others for damnation. ‘There may appear to be a two-fold will of God for salvation and reprobation’, T.F. writes, ‘but at the Parousia we shall see that there was only one divine will for our salvation.’

We think of election negatively because of the disturbing notion of some being damned by God as presented by Federal Calvinism; but a true understanding of election, rooted in Christ, is positive and should be proclaimed widely in preaching. It offers us assurance that we are all included in God’s love.

God claims all of humanity in Christ: ‘In Christ we are all judged – and in so far as Christ died for all, then are all dead – but In Him we are all chosen by God’s Grace.’

Included in the election of the risen Christ is the election of every man, woman and child. Each individual is thus determined by the love of God... The message preferred by the doctrine of predestination is no longer a mixed message of joy and terror, salvation and damnation, but a message that is unequivocally one of comfort and joy.

Thus Karl Barth asserts, ‘The doctrine of election is the sum of the Gospel because of all words that can be said or heard it is the best.’

Election is grace, which means that there is no reason for doubt in salvation, and the exclusion of our own labours in trying to achieve it.

According to this understanding that election is grace, two deterministic, logico-causal doctrines of election must be rejected. Federal Calvinists present election prior to grace; Arminians present grace prior to election. J.B. writes,

The scholastic Calvinists made election prior to grace, beginning with the doctrine of a double decree as a major premise, and then moving on to formulate the doctrines of grace, incarnation and atonement, as God’s way of executing the eternal decrees - thereby 'logically' teaching that Christ died only for the elect, to secure infallibly the salvation of the elect. The Arminians on the other hand made grace prior to election, so that grace means that Christ died to make all men savable, but God, foreknowing those who would decide, elects them. This... grounds our salvation on our human decision. This separation of election from grace, from a proper trinitarian understanding of the being and will of God, led to the polarisation of 'Calvinists' and 'Arminians' in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.96

---

92 T.F.T., ‘Universalism or election?’, 316.
94 David A. S. Fergusson, ‘Predestination: A Scottish Perspective’, Scottish Journal of Theology 46 (1993), 472-3. Fergusson is writing of Barth’s doctrine of election but it is applicable to that of the Torrance brothers.

J.B. argues that Federal Calvinism and Arminianism separate election and grace. This leads to a doctrine of limited atonement in Federal Calvinism and to Pelagianism in Arminianism. Whilst the Arminians are right to believe that God does not elect some for reprobation, their logico-causal reasoning leads to the fallacy that salvation depends upon human achievement. On the other hand, the Federal Calvinists rightly affirm that salvation is by God’s grace, but falsely believe that God elects some for reprobation. The problem lies in answering the ‘how’ question without first looking to the ‘who’ question. They disregard God’s self-revelation in Christ, instead projecting their own human reasoning onto God.

T.F. argues that the ‘pre’ in ‘predestination’ should be understood not according to logico-temporal categories but to being grounded in God Himself.97 When Federal Calvinism makes election precede grace, this means that Christ is displaced as the ground of election. This then dislocates the will of the Father and the mission of the Son.98 The Federal Calvinists present a different God behind the back of Jesus. But as we have seen, the Father and Son are one in their nature and mission, for the Son is the revelation of the Father. T.F. argues, ‘Christ is Himself identical with the action of God toward men; He is the full and complete Word of God. There is therefore no higher will than Grace or Christ... as the express image of God He covers the whole Face and Heart of the Father’.99 Election in Christ is grace; there must be no separation of the two.

Conclusion

In God’s unconditional covenant of grace, He has elected all of humanity in Christ. God does not elect some for salvation and others for damnation. He is not related to all by law and only to some by grace. Election is grace and is the proclamation that everyone is included in

98 Ibid., 109.
99 Ibid., 110.
God’s covenantal love. Election is not prior to grace, as in Federal Calvinism, which leads to a doctrine of limited atonement, nor is grace prior to election, as in Arminianism, which leads to Pelagianism. God’s election and grace must not be placed within man-made logico-causal categories but rather guided by God’s self-revelation of His filial purposes in Christ. This gives us assurance of salvation because the burden does not fall upon humanity to make the right choice and choose God. Rather, God has already chosen us. When election is understood in Christ, this takes the burden away from humanity. We no longer have to worry that we are not one of God’s elect. Nor do we have to wear ourselves out trying to bear fruit that is evidence of our salvation. God’s election of humanity in Christ means that we are all included in His plan of redemption.

Universal Atonement and Universalism

Universal Atonement

God’s election of all of humanity in Christ has universal implications for redemption. The Torrances believe that all of humanity is included in Christ’s atonement. As the Apostle John proclaims, ‘Herein is love, not that we loved God but that He loved us and sent His Son to be the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only but for the sins of the whole world’ (1 John 4:10; 2:2). Therefore, they contest the Federal Calvinist doctrine of limited atonement, believing that it wrongly asserts a limitation on God’s love and grace.

A.T.B. McGowan seeks to defend Federal theology from the criticism of J.B. and others that it does not adequately reflect the grace of God. He argues that there is diversity within Federal theology and therefore it should not be so broadly condemned. Thomas Boston is an example, McGowan argues, of a Federal theologian who has a theology of grace, thereby defying J.B.’s criticism. Boston adheres to the fundamentals of Federal theology, such as the election of some to salvation in Christ and others to damnation, and the doctrine of limited atonement. However, McGowan argues that Boston’s theology is also a theology of grace because he believes in evangelical repentance; Boston believes that repentance is only possible in the light of faith. Therefore, forgiveness is not conditional upon repentance; repentance follows forgiveness. For McGowan, Boston’s example invalidates J.B.’s criticism that Federal theology does not adequately reflect the grace of God. He believes that J.B.’s criticism only applies to some negative distortions in the historical development of Federal theology and does not demonstrate any incongruence with the gospel of God’s grace.

100 T.F.T., ‘Universalism or election?’, 316.
102 Ibid., 50.

However, McGowan’s argument does not adequately defend Federal theology from J.B.’s criticism. J.B. recognises elements of grace in Federal theology; in the Federal scheme, God elects some to grace in Christ. But, for J.B., Federal theology’s understanding of grace is ‘an impoverishment and restriction of the concept of grace’. This is because there is a ‘priority of law over grace’. Grace is subordinated to an overarching legal framework which does not adequately reflect God’s primarily filial purposes for humanity. Therefore, although Boston has an evangelical rather than legal understanding of repentance, this does not counter J.B.’s criticism. Boston still limits God’s grace by adhering to the election of only some and to limited atonement. These are fundamentals of Federal theology, which means that it is in its essence a limitation of God’s grace. Federal theology is therefore incongruent with God’s universal grace made known in Christ.

The Torrances also perceive the Federal doctrine of limited atonement to lead to a lack of assurance in salvation. T.F. observes, ‘For generations of people in the Kirk faith was deeply disturbed and shaken by the doctrine thundered from the pulpits that Christ did not die for all but only for a few chosen ones—assurance of their salvation withered in face of the inscrutable decree of divine predestination.’ John Coffey, however, contests that it is universal atonement that leads to a lack of assurance. Coffey argues that universal atonement only makes salvation a potentiality since some do not choose faith in Christ. Limited atonement is the true ground of assurance because salvation is a certainty for the elect. Coffey writes, 103 Ibid., 47-9. Cf. Helm, Calvin and the Calvinists, 64. Helm argues that the Puritans did distinguish legal and evangelical repentance.

---

104 Ibid., 41.
106 Ibid., 8.
108 T.F.T., Scottish Theology, 59.
109 Coffey, Politics, Religion, 137.
Indeed, the whole point about limited or definite atonement was that it reinforced assurance. The Cross did not just make salvation possible or hypothetical, it made it certain; if Christ had died for a person, that person’s salvation was guaranteed. The doctrine of universal atonement, on the other hand, granted no such assurance. It was cold comfort to be told that Christ had died for you, when you did not know whether Christ’s atonement for you was effectual or merely hypothetical.¹¹⁰

However, Coffey’s argument is unconvincing. According to limited atonement, Christ only died for some. This leads to the problem of people worrying whether they are one of the few chosen for salvation. Assurance of salvation is limited to only the chosen, and even they may worry that they do not have salvation, since there is the possibility of being predestined for damnation. This is not a convincing ground for assurance of salvation. Furthermore, Coffey misunderstands universal atonement. It does not make salvation merely ‘possible’ or ‘hypothetical’; salvation is an accomplished reality for all of humanity. It is therefore universal atonement that provides the true ground for assurance.

Universalism

The Torrances’ belief in the election of all in Christ and in universal atonement raises the question of whether this leads to universalism. As David Fergusson expresses it, ‘If all are from eternity elect in Christ, does this not imply that everyone must willy nilly be gathered in at the end?’¹¹¹ The Torrances have often been criticised for being universalists.¹¹² John Coffey considers J.B.’s belief ‘that God was equally loving towards all mankind’ to be a ‘universalist idea’.¹¹³

It is a common mistake to equate universal atonement and universalism. Such a misunderstanding presents a serious danger that universal atonement is dismissed along with universalism. This has significant implications because then people can be thrown back upon themselves for salvation. John Wimber, for example, does not seem to recognise the distinction between universal atonement (that Christ’s death is effective for the salvation of all people) and universalism (that all people will ultimately be reconciled) and therefore in his denial of universalism, he seems to reject universal atonement. This results in his placing the emphasis on our human choice in salvation:

---

¹¹⁰ Ibid.
¹¹³ Coffey, Politics, Religion, 133.

This does not mean that by his death Christ saves all people. Universalism – the idea that all people will ultimately be saved – is not scriptural. The Bible speaks of an eternal hell and makes it clear that only believers in Christ are saved from eternal damnation. Forgiveness through Christ’s atoning sacrifice must be received by faith, and submitting to him. The choice is ours.\(^{114}\)

The Torrances are emphatically clear that they are not universalists. J.B. makes the distinction, ‘This is not ‘universalism’ but it is universal love.’\(^{115}\) Universal love is an aspect of the doctrine of universalism but it is not to be equated. For T.F., this universal love is the positive aspect of universalism; it seeks to uphold the love of God in contrast to Federal theology where it is subordinated to an overarching legal framework.\(^ {116}\) However, T.F. believes that a true appreciation of God’s universal love must lead to a rejection of universalism because it does not recognise the urgency of evangelism.\(^ {117}\) T.F. is strongly critical of universalism, arguing that it ignores the reality of hell and the necessity of mission.\(^ {118}\)

Myk Habets argues that, for T.F., universal atonement does not lead to universalism because of the distinction between, in the language of John Craig, ‘carnal’ and ‘spiritual’ union. All have a carnal union with Christ by virtue of our common humanity; but only some are united by the Spirit to Christ and obtain the benefits of this union.\(^ {119}\) Those who have a ‘spiritual’ union will ultimately have eternal life and those with only a ‘carnal’ union are damned. However, it is important to note that although T.F. engages with John Craig’s language of ‘carnal’ and ‘spiritual’ union in The School of Faith, this is because his concern in this book is to summarise the core aspects of the Reformed faith.\(^ {120}\) T.F. does not take up \(^{115}\) J.B.T., ‘The Incarnation and ‘Limited Atonement’’, 85.

\(^{116}\) T.F.T., ‘Universalism or election?’, 314.

\(^{117}\) Ibid., 318.

\(^{118}\) Ibid., 311-13. T.F.T. wrote this article criticising universalism in response to J.A.T. Robinson, ‘Universalism – is it heretical?’, Scottish Journal of Theology 2 (1949), 139-145.

\(^{120}\) T.F.T., School of Faith, cvi.
this language in his own work. This language is noticeably absent from his work which is specifically focused on universalism and predestination.\textsuperscript{121}

In fact, T.F. perceives a problem with using this language, which may have been the reason for his not employing it in his own work. T.F. perceives the danger that distinguishing two different kinds of union could present God’s grace as conditional and throw people back upon themselves to accomplish the spiritual union. When T.F. comments on Craig’s language, he stresses that the spiritual union is not additional to the carnal union. There is one union accomplished by Christ. The spiritual union must be understood as a participation in this one union.\textsuperscript{122} ‘If the spiritual union is an additional union’, he argues, ‘then our salvation depends not only on the finished work of Christ but upon something else as well which has later to be added on to it before it is real for us.’\textsuperscript{123} He saw this conditional grace in the Westminster Catechism and the practical implications of this in the lack of assurance and burden felt by congregations. In contention with this language, he writes, ‘As against that grave aberration it must be insisted that there is only one union with Christ, that which He has wrought out with us in His birth and life and death and resurrection and in which He gives us to share through the gift of the Holy Spirit.’\textsuperscript{124} For T.F., it is better to speak of one union with Christ and not make distinctions which could lead to a misunderstanding of conditional grace.

\textbf{Irrationality of Sin}

Universalism is flawed, for T.F., because it does not take adequate account of the fundamentally irrational fact of sin. He points to the awful and absurd reality that preaching the Gospel leads to some hardening their hearts.\textsuperscript{125} T.F. describes the rejection of God’s love as inexplicable and devastating:

\begin{quote}
To choose our own way in spite of God’s absolute choice of us, to listen to the voice of His infinite love and to know that we are already apprehended by that love in the death of Jesus, and by that very apprehension of love to be given the \end{quote}

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{121} It appears from Habets’ reference to W.D. Rankin that Habets was following Rankin in employing this language. Cf. W.D. Rankin, ‘Carnal Union with Christ in the Theology of T. F. Torrance’, PhD Thesis, University of Edinburgh, 1997.
\item \textsuperscript{122} T.F.T., \textit{School of Faith}, cvii- cviii.
\item \textsuperscript{123} \textit{Ibid.}, cvii.
\item \textsuperscript{124} \textit{Ibid.}, cvii.
\item \textsuperscript{125} T.F.T., ‘Universalism or election?’, 318.
\end{itemize}
\end{footnotesize} opportunity and capacity to respond in faith and love, and still to draw back in proud independence and selfish denial of God's love, is an act of bottomless horror. If the light that is in us be darkness, how great is that darkness! To choose our own way and yet in that choice still to be chosen by God would be hell. Can we imagine anything more appalling than that a man should use the very power that God gives him to choose to contradict God, should choose to depart from God, and yet be unable to depart, because in spite of all he is still grasped by God in an act of eternal love that will not let him go? ¹²⁶

T.F. believes that God does not send the damned to hell, nor did He create the hell they experience; God loves all of humanity everlastingly. It is in rejecting this love that one can experience a hell of one’s own creation:

Even when a man has made his bed in hell God’s hand of love will continue to grasp him there. To choose finally and for ever—unfathomable mystery of iniquity—to say "No" to Jesus is to be held in a hell of one’s own choosing and making. It is not God who makes hell, for hell is the contradiction of all that is of God. ¹²⁷

This rejection of God is an absurdity. The problem with the doctrine of universalism is that it attempts to rationalise the irrational mystery of sin and evil. ¹²⁸

It commits the dogmatic fallacy of systematising the illogical. Sin has a fundamentally surd-like character. Somehow evil posits itself and cannot be rationalised. The New Testament teaches that when it speaks of the mystery of iniquity, and of the bottomless pit (abyssos). Evil is fundamentally discontinuity.
No explanation involving only continuity or coherence can ever approach the problem, for that would be to draw the line of continuity dialectically over discontinuity. The doctrine of the atonement teaches us that no matter how much we think about it, here our reason reaches its limit. It cannot bridge the contradiction between God and man in guilt. The contradiction is resolved only by an act of God in which man in contradiction to God is reconciled and yet the terrible bottomless reality of sin is not denied. ¹²⁹

¹²⁶ Ibid., 316-7.
¹²⁷ Ibid., 317.
¹²⁸ Ibid., 313-4.
¹²⁹ Ibid.
Therefore, although the doctrine of universalism can point to the possibility that all will be saved, it cannot point to the impossibility of some being lost. Ultimately, whether all of humanity will live reconciled with God is a mystery.

Conclusion

The election of all humanity in Christ has universal implications for redemption. The Torrances therefore seek to challenge Federal Calvinism’s doctrine of limited atonement. They perceive it as wrongly limiting God’s grace, forcing it into a preconceived legal framework. Limited atonement leads to a lack of assurance in salvation and the problem of people wearing themselves out trying to obtain it. Only universal atonement can provide the true ground for assurance because it declares that Christ has died for the salvation of all people. This liberates us from trying to achieve what we have been given already.

Another problem arises, however, when universal atonement is equated with universalism. The rejection of universalism can then lead to a rejection of universal atonement, which presents the danger of throwing people back upon their own endeavours for salvation. However, for T.F., universalism does not take adequate account of the irrational fact of sin and evil, whereby people choose to reject God. The ultimate end of all of humanity remains a mystery. God’s plan of salvation cannot be understood according to human logico-causal reasoning; rather, we should look to His self-revelation in Christ and thereby understand salvation in light of God’s primarily filial purposes for humanity. God has chosen all of humanity for redemption in Christ, which means that we are all inescapably included in the atonement.

---

130 Ibid., 312.
131 Ibid., 314.
God’s Sovereignty and Human Freedom

God’s Sovereignty

In this universal plan of salvation, all are chosen by God and reconciled in Christ, irrespective of our own will. T.F. writes of our election as a ‘fait accompli’ and of our existence as wholly determined by Christ:

The great fact of the Gospel then is this: that God has actually chosen us in Jesus Christ in spite of our sin, and that in the death of Christ that election has become a fait accompli. It means too that God has chosen all men, in as much as Christ died for all men, and because that is once and for all no one can ever elude the election of His love. In as much as no one exists except by the Word of God by whom all things were made and in whom all things consist, and in as much as this is the Word that has once and for all enacted the eternal election of grace to embrace all men, the existence of every man whether he will or no is bound up inextricably with that election—with the Cross of Jesus Christ. Every man’s being is bound up for ever with the one and indivisible act of God’s love in Jesus Christ.\(^\text{132}\)

Salvation is entirely by the grace of God, excluding any human endeavour. This is prefigured in Jesus’ conception; Joseph, who is symbolic of humanity, has no part.\(^\text{133}\) T.F. writes, ‘The virgin birth means that the sovereignty of man... has no place.’\(^\text{134}\) He perceives in this the basic gospel message: humanity is saved not by anything that we could do but by God’s grace alone.\(^\text{135}\)

Human Freedom

The sovereignty of God in redemption raises the question of how we are to understand human freedom. T.F. writes of our human autonomy being set aside.\(^\text{136}\) In their affirmation

\(^{132}\) Ibid, 315.
\(^{133}\) T.F.T., Mediation, 100-2.
\(^{135}\) T.F.T., Mediation, 100-2.
\(^{136}\) Ibid., 100.
of God’s universal grace, the Torrances have been criticised for undermining human freedom.\textsuperscript{137}

In addressing this criticism, the nature of human freedom must first be examined. Maurice Bevan considers that the underlying assumption of this criticism is that we are freely self-determined individuals. However, Bevan argues that this perspective is a product of Western post-Enlightenment philosophy and that we are not as free as we suppose.\textsuperscript{138} In this finite world, T.F. believes that humanity can only have a contingent freedom. Human beings are free, but in such a way that is proper to a limited and contingent existence. We are upheld by the transcendent freedom of God.\textsuperscript{139}

Moreover, what we perceive to be freedom is only a sinful self-will. Paul uses the language of being ‘enslaved to sin’ (Rom. 6). Thus we are not truly free. The error of Arminianism is to believe that humanity has an absolutely free will. But our sinful self-will usurps our freedom, making it impossible to attain our own redemption.\textsuperscript{140} ‘Paradoxically enough’, T.F. argues, ‘to give man arbitrium over the act of his own salvation is to land him in determinism.’\textsuperscript{141}

When T.F. writes of our human autonomy being set aside, he has in mind this sinful self-will. And this is the basis of the establishment of a true freedom. T.F. writes, ‘Man’s will is not overridden. His self-will is certainly judged and forgiven, but it is recreated and determined by love; it is directed in the only path where it can find true freedom – and in all that it is man that wills!’\textsuperscript{142} Therefore, God does not undermine our human freedom but rather truly establishes it because we are liberated from our enslaved, sinful condition to participate in the very life of God. Bevan argues that freedom, understood in this contingent sense, is not curtailed by the \textit{fait accompli} of our universal election and redemption. He explains, ‘The human creature cannot make a free decision to accept what already sustains his or her being through grace but remains free to reject the notion that the fallen

\textsuperscript{138} Ibid., 188.
\textsuperscript{139} Ibid., 188-9.
\textsuperscript{140} T.F.T., ‘Predestination’, 121-22.
\textsuperscript{141} Ibid., 118.
\textsuperscript{142} Ibid., 120.
conditions of finite existence represent absolute truth.'\textsuperscript{143} T.F. argues that it is the doctrine of universalism that undermines human freedom; it destroys the free decision of faith.\textsuperscript{144}

The absurdity of the criticism should also be considered. It is akin to being taken on a fantastic holiday but resenting it. The \textit{fait accompli} of our redemption is to be celebrated and enjoyed! Paul uses the language of being ‘enslaved’ in regards to both sin and righteousness (Rom. 6). However, for Paul, this enslavement to righteousness is a welcome transformation:

\begin{quote}
But thanks be to God that, though you used to be slaves to sin, you have come to obey from your heart the pattern of teaching that has now claimed your allegiance... When you were slaves to sin, you were free from the control of righteousness. What benefit did you reap at that time from the things you are now ashamed of? Those things result in death! But now that you have been set free from sin and have become slaves of God, the benefit you reap leads to holiness, and the result is eternal life. For the wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord (Rom. 6:17, 20-23).\end{quote}

Redemption is impossible by our own endeavours because of our enslavement to the sinful self-will. That our lives are in the hands of God is fundamental to our creaturely existence. It is a comfort to know that we are in the hands of a God of everlasting love and grace, who entered our humanity in order to transform it, doing what we are incapable of doing ourselves.

It is the \textit{fait accompli} of our redemption that establishes our freedom to decide for God. T.F. argues, ‘...the \textit{Biblical doctrine of election} is the very doctrine which expresses the universal action of God’s grace in such a way that, far from dissolving the personal elements of choice and decision, it establishes them.’\textsuperscript{145} God’s grace is not irresistible; we remain free to reject God’s grace, inconceivable as this is. But for T.F., humanity can only make a free and true decision for God because of God’s prior decision for us: ‘It is WE who believe, and we come to believe in a personal encounter with the living Word. Faith entails a genuine human decision, but at its heart there is a divine decision, which, as it were, catches up and makes it what it is, begotten of the Holy Ghost.’\textsuperscript{146}

\begin{flushright}
\textsuperscript{143} Bevan, ‘Person of Christ’, 193. \\
\textsuperscript{144} T.F.T., ‘Universalism or election?’, 313. \\
\textsuperscript{145} Ibid., 314. \\
\textsuperscript{146} T.F.T., ‘Predestination’, 130.
\end{flushright}
There can be no doubt about it that when confronted with Jesus Christ man makes a decision – but that decision is also a double-sided act. When he decides, he finds that it has been decided already, and it is the divine decision that qualifies his decision and makes it what it is faith in God. His decision is made faith through the Object of faith to which faith conforms. The possibility and the character of will and of faith do not lie in themselves but in that to which they are directed and that which determines them in that direction. And so here we have real freedom for the first time, because we have will directed by its proper Object, Jesus Christ.\textsuperscript{147}

The relation between the divine decision already decided and the decision of the human being in response is constituted by the Holy Spirit.\textsuperscript{148} The human decision does not have an independent existence from the divine decision. It cannot be understood according to synergistic or logico-causal categories.\textsuperscript{149} T.F. argues, ‘[Election] does not mean the repudiation of human freedom but its creation, and the repudiation of bondage.’\textsuperscript{150} God’s universal grace is the very means by which human freedom is established.\textsuperscript{151}

Logico-Causal Categories

For the Torrances, God’s grace and human participation cannot be fit into logico-causal categories. Logico-causal reasoning leads to the fallacies of an independent free will or irresistible grace.\textsuperscript{152} Universalism asserts, according to human logic, the necessity of everyone ultimately living reconciled with God. Thus it falls prey to the fundamental flaw of constructing a doctrine from human logic rather than from the self-revelation of God. T.F. asks, \textit{Is the love of God to be understood abstractly in terms of what we can think about it on a human analogy, such as human love raised to the \textit{nth} degree, or are we to understand the love of God in terms of what God has actually manifested of His love, that is Biblically?... The only valid analogy we have is in the life and death of Jesus Christ and there we learn where divine love was poured out to the utmost that men in unbelievable hardening of heart rejected it to the very last.}

\textsuperscript{147} Ibid., 124.
\textsuperscript{148} Ibid., 127. See chapter three for further examination of the Holy Spirit’s role in redemption.
\textsuperscript{149} Ibid., 129.
\textsuperscript{150} Ibid., 119.
\textsuperscript{151} T.F.T., ‘Universalism or election?’. 314.
\textsuperscript{152} T.F.T., ‘Predestination’, 130.
Dare we go behind Calvary to argue our way to a conclusion which if we could reach by logic would make the Cross meaningless?\(^{153}\)

Similarly, J.B. argues that it is wrong to formulate a doctrine of God that fits neatly into a logical system rather than from His self-revelation in Christ.\(^{154}\)

The logic of the incarnation is not the logic of Aristotle. It seems to me a danger in ‘Systematic Theology’... to have a neatly structured ‘system’ (no doubt based on biblical texts) into which we fit God and Christ and atonement ‘logically’, as in pigeon holes, and fail to see that every doctrine must be seen in the light of God’s self-revelation in Jesus Christ as Father, Son and Holy Spirit.\(^{155}\)

However, this appeal to subordinating human logic to God’s self-revelation does not satisfy some. For W.D. Rankin, the logical outcome of T.F.’s theology is universalism. Therefore, for Rankin, T.F.’s rejection of universalism is contradictory.\(^{156}\) Rankin wishes to adhere to logico-causal categories. The problem with this, however, is that it contradicts God’s self-revelation in Christ, which must be the ultimate standard of authority.

Paul Helm uses an exercise in logic to dispute criticism of the doctrine of limited atonement.\(^{157}\) In so doing, Helm anticipates the disapproval of J.B. for using ‘Aristotelian logic’. But Helm argues that if J.B. dismisses logic, he ought to dismiss all argument, including his own criticism of limited atonement. Helm writes, ‘For it must not be forgotten that an argument that dismisses a theological view as the product of Aristotelian logic is still an argument, and if we throw out all argument we throw out that argument as well.’\(^{158}\) However, Helm does not adequately appreciate or address J.B.’s contention. J.B. does not dismiss the use of logic in theological discussion. His is concerned by the subordination of God’s self-revelation in Christ to prior frameworks of human logic because this distorts the truth of God.

\(^{153}\) T.F.T., ‘Universalism or election?’, 310-12.
\(^{154}\) J.B.T., ‘Incarnation and ‘Limited atonement”’, 86.
\(^{155}\) Ibid.
\(^{156}\) Rankin, ‘Carnal Union’, 291-2.
\(^{158}\) Ibid., 54.
Conclusion

God’s universal plan of salvation makes our election and redemption a fait accompli. This raises the question of how we are to understand human freedom. The Torrances have been criticised for undermining human autonomy. However, this criticism presupposes an impossible notion of freedom whereby we are autonomous self-determined individuals. Humanity, as creatures in a finite world, has an essentially contingent freedom. God sets aside our self-will, which is enslaved to sin and ultimately deterministic, but in so doing establishes for us a true freedom. God’s grace is not irresistible; we remain free for the inconceivable horror of rejecting God’s grace. Yet humanity can only make a free and true decision for God because of God’s prior decision for us. Human freedom is not undermined but truly established by God’s sovereignty.

For the Torrances, God’s grace and human participation resist being forced into logico-causal categories. Logico-causal reasoning leads to belief in an independent free will, the election of only some, limited atonement, irresistible grace and universalism. In such cases God’s self-revelation in Christ is subordinated to prior frameworks of human logic which distorts the truth of who God is and how He relates to humanity. We can only understand God in the light of His self-revelation in Christ: the priority of the ‘who’ question over the ‘how’ question.

Conclusion

The Torrances’ covenantal and filial soteriology is guided by God’s self-revelation in Christ. We can only understand how God relates to humanity by first looking to who He is. Jesus is of one being with the Father and the very expression of the Father’s love for humanity, showing us that His purposes are primarily filial rather than judicial. This challenges two notions: firstly, that the Father relates to humanity in merely distant, legal terms; and, secondly, that the Father is pitted against the Son in the satisfaction of His wrath. The Torrances argue that God’s self-revelation in Christ shows us that the Father and Son are one in their mission to adopt all of humanity as children of God in order to share in the life and love of God.
From God’s self-revelation in Christ we can learn that He has made a unilateral covenant with humanity, fulfilling all the conditions through Christ in our place and on our behalf. This defies a contractual understanding of God whereby we must strive to fulfil the conditions ourselves. Preaching and teaching can advance this conditional, contractual understanding as a result of the concern that unconditional grace leads to lawlessness. However, this human reasoning only serves to increase lawlessness. God’s gracious covenant does not diminish our legal obligations but actually strengthens them because we are able to offer ourselves back to God in freedom, knowing that the covenant has already been fulfilled for us in Christ.

God’s unconditional covenant with humanity means that all of humanity is elect in Christ. This challenges the belief that God elects some for salvation and others for damnation, whereby God is related to all by law but only to some by grace. These notions subordinate the self-revelation of God in Christ to human logic. With the knowledge that we are all elect in Christ, this takes a tremendous burden away from humanity. We do not have to worry whether we are one of God’s chosen few, nor do we have to burn ourselves out trying to bear fruit as evidence of our salvation. God’s election of humanity in Christ means that we are all included.

The election of all humanity in Christ has universal implications for redemption. This resists a doctrine of limited atonement, whereby Christ died for the salvation of some rather than for all. This is to constrain God’s grace within the bounds of human rationality. Human logic also often equates universal atonement with universalism. It is then considered necessary to reject universal atonement along with universalism. This can lead to people being thrown back upon their own endeavours in salvation. However, human reasoning cannot rationalise the irrational fact of sin whereby people choose to reject God. The ultimate end of humanity remains a mystery for us.

The fait accompli of our election and redemption raises the question of how we are to understand human freedom. It challenges our notions of human freedom, reminding us of the contingency of our existence. God’s setting aside of our self-will may cause offence, but this offence only serves to remind us of its enslavement to sin. We can only make a free and true decision for God because of God’s prior decision for us. This is cause for celebration; human freedom is not undermined but ultimately truly established by God’s sovereignty.
Weariness and a lack of assurance in salvation are the result of trying to comprehend God and His dealings with humanity within our own logical frameworks. God’s universal covenant of grace resists logico-causal categories. God can only be understood in light of His self-revelation in Christ: the priority of the ‘who’ question over the ‘how’ question. God is a covenant God, not a contract God, with filial purposes for humanity, choosing all of humanity for salvation in Christ so that we might share in the life and love of the triune God of grace. This gives us assurance of salvation and freedom from the necessity of earning it by our own endeavours. In the second chapter, we will go on to explore more deeply God’s self-revelation in Christ and the significance of his vicarious humanity for our salvation.
The Vicarious Humanity of the Son:
Ontological over External

For the Torrances, God’s claiming of humanity in Christ is an ontological event. Salvation is worked out in the very depths of Jesus’ own being on account of his vicarious humanity. This transforms our humanity in the very depths of our own being. This is more evocative of Eastern Orthodox soteriology than the typically external, legal categories of the Latin tradition in Western theology. The incarnation of Christ is integral to the atonement; it is on account of Christ’s assumption of human flesh that the human nature is transformed and the powers of sin and death are defeated.\(^1\) The descent of Christ in the incarnation then makes possible the ascension of humanity to participate in the life of God (\textit{theosis}).\(^2\) Ontological, transformative and participatory categories are central to the Eastern Orthodox scheme of salvation. In recent years, modern re-readings of Luther and Calvin have perceived a more participatory understanding of salvation in contrast to a simple external, legal interpretation.\(^3\) However, there is much debate in this regard, and an external, forensic scheme continues to be widely defended.\(^4\)

---

\(^3\) See Tuomo Mannermaa, \textit{Christ Present in Faith: Luther’s View of Justification} (Minneapolis: Augsburg Press, 2005); ed. Carl E. Braaten and Robert W. Jenson, \textit{Union with Christ: The New Finnish Interpretation of Luther} (Grand Rapids, Eerdmans, 1998); Stephen Chester, “It is No Longer I Who
In the popular external, forensic scheme of salvation, the cross is typically understood as an external, forensic transaction whereby God is conditioned to forgive humanity on account of Christ’s penal substitution. An external, forensic scheme typically looks exclusively to Christ’s death rather than to the significance of his whole life, incarnation, resurrection, ascension and Pentecost. In focusing on Christ’s death, there is a tendency to affirm a retrospective forgiveness of sins but to overlook the significance of the prospective aspect of the atonement. In an external, forensic scheme, justification can be conceived of simply in terms of an external imputation of righteousness. Preaching and teaching can then call upon people to make a decision of faith in response in order to be ‘justified by faith’. ⁵

The Torrances argue that a primarily judicial scheme does not reflect God’s primarily filial purposes for humanity and an external concept cannot truly transform humanity. A judicial and external scheme thereby disregards the prospective aspect of the atonement whereby we are not only forgiven but reborn to new life as sons and daughters of God to share by the Spirit in Christ’s filial relationship with the Father. Furthermore, in an external, judicial scheme, salvation is presented as a potentiality rather than as a reality. People are thrown back upon themselves to work up enough faith in order to secure their salvation. As Deddo observes,

The grace of God can begin to seem merely as if it provided us with a new potential. We can end up thinking: ‘By grace God made the Christian life possible by forgiving our sins and giving us a new status of being in right relationship with him. Now all we have to do is appropriate, apply or actualize that new potential life that God has graciously given us.’ ⁶

---

⁵ For the purposes of the argument, description of this external, forensic model of the atonement may tend towards caricaturization. However, examples of who exemplify these elements of an external, forensic scheme will be explored in the course of the chapter.

This perceived responsibility for our salvation can lead to weariness and a lack of joy and assurance. Here the significance of the Torrances’ soteriology can be felt most acutely: only an ontological scheme can truly save humanity and liberate us from our own endeavours to obtain salvation.

The Latin Heresy

External

T.F. describes the Western tendency to conceptualise salvation in terms of external relations as ‘the Latin heresy’. T.F. sees the problem with this in relation to Arius’ heresy that there is only an external relation between the Father and the Son, which means that humanity cannot truly be saved.\(^7\) An external scheme of salvation, for T.F., cannot ‘penetrate into our ontological depths’ and transform humanity from its state of corruption to be reborn as a new creation.\(^8\) Following Athanasius, who affirmed the homoousion in refutation of Arius, T.F. argues that salvation is not external but rather takes place within Christ’s incarnate constitution:

> ...since Jesus Christ is himself God and man in one Person, and all his divine and human acts issue from his one Person, the atoning mediation and redemption which he wrought for us, fall within his own being and life as the one Mediator between God and man. That is to say, the work of atoning salvation does not take place outside of Christ, as something external to him, but takes place within him, within the incarnate constitution of his Person as Mediator.\(^9\)

T.F. identifies the Latin heresy in the medieval ethical conception of the atonement, as exemplified by Peter Abelard, and in the judicial conception of the atonement, as exemplified by St Anselm. These external formulations were challenged when the Reformers pointed to the Gift and the Giver as one. However, T.F. laments that the person and work of Christ have subsequently been divided in Protestant theology, and external theories of the atonement prevail in both forensic and ethical forms.10

---

\(^9\) Ibid., 155.

Forensic

Modern preaching and teaching can present the atonement chiefly or even exclusively in terms of penal substitution.11 A.T.B. McGowan, for example, upholds a Federal view of the atonement whereby Jesus offers a life of perfect obedience to God, ultimately submitting to punishment on the cross on behalf of the elect.12 McGowan seeks to affirm every model of the atonement, but ultimately believes that they are subordinate to the controlling metaphor of penal substitution.13 Similarly, Michael Horton upholds a forensic framework of salvation. He argues that the Federal view holds together both the ‘legal and relational, judicial and familial’.14 However, for Horton, justification is ‘the forensic basis of union with Christ’.15 He writes, ‘Justification is exclusively juridical, yet it is the forensic origin of our union with Christ, from which all of our covenantal blessings flow.’16 Therefore, whilst Federal theology may seek to espouse the relational and familial aspects of atonement, it is nevertheless subordinated to an overarching legal and judicial framework.

T.F. does not deny the forensic element of the atonement in Scripture.17 He is often misrepresented in this regard.18 However, he does point out that the New Testament never 10 T.F.T., ‘Latin Heresy’, 477-78. See also J.B.’s classification of three models of worship, which can be applied more broadly to salvation: (1) the Harnack (Hick) model; (2) the existential, present-day experience model; and (3) the incarnational trinitarian model. The first two models are ‘unitarian’ for they conceive of God and humanity in external terms and of humanity’s response in isolation from Christ. The third model is trinitarian for it conceives of humanity sharing by the Spirit in Christ’s communion with the Father. J.B.T., Worship, 12-25.

---

11 See for example Steve Jeffery, Michael Overy and Andrew Sach, Pierced for Our Transgressions: Rediscovering the Glory of Penal Substitution (Nottingham: IVP, 2007), published in support of the doctrine of penal substitution in reaction to the controversy surrounding Steve Chalke’s comments in Steve Chalke, The Lost Message of Jesus (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2003), 182.
13 Ibid., 206.
15 Ibid., 129.
16 Ibid., 139.
18 T.F.T. is often misrepresented as denying any forensic aspect of the atonement and of presenting a forensic understanding as mutually exclusive to a participatory understanding. See A.T.B. McGowan, ‘Justification and the Ordo Salutis’ in Foundations 51 (2004), 14,16; Horton, Covenant and Salvation, refers to the judgement which Christ bore for us as a ‘punishment’, which he believes indicates that the atonement has a profounder meaning than could be expressed by a doctrine of penal substitution. Indeed, Paul presents various metaphors when describing salvation, for example, taken from the lawcourt (Rom. 3:24-26), temple sacrifices (Rom. 3:25), adoption (Gal. 4:4-7) and the slavemarket (1 Cor. 7:23). Surely this suggests that the forensic element of salvation should not be made absolute but remain a metaphor, expressing the ultimate ontological reality as revealed in the person of Christ.

The Torrances seek to contest the forensic element being presented as the overarching framework for salvation. As J.B. often asserts, God’s purposes for humanity are primarily filial rather than judicial. T.F. argues that a federal framework of external relations does not adequately explain how humanity is transformed. Nor does it reflect that God gave of His very own Self in Christ. It dangerously suggests, J.B. argues, a God who needs to be changed in order to accept humanity and an impersonal view of humanity as the object of justice. Furthermore, in focusing upon what God has done for us, without an account of Christ’s vicarious humanity, the human response falls upon us, leading to the burden that we are co-authors of our salvation.

Ethical

Another popular understanding of the atonement is in ethical terms. For example, David Brondos presents Jesus as an ethical example whom we must follow in order to be saved. According to Brondos, Jesus defies the present age by resisting evil and living for God, on account of which God raises him from the dead. We must follow Jesus’ example by making a decision to identify with the coming age rather than the present one. Humanity is still under the power of sin and death but committed believers have certainty of a future transformation at the eschaton.22

---

21 J.B.T., ‘Introduction’, Nature of the Atonement, 15; ‘Concept of Federal Theology’, 35. Yet it was Adam not God who was hiding in the Garden of Eden because of sin (Gen 3:8).
Brondos presents an external, ethical understanding because he believes that it is impossible to participate in Christ. He believes that the historical particularity of Jesus makes sharing in his life impossible. The gospels do not present Jesus in a mythical way, he argues, but in concrete historical terms. It is logically impossible to participate in a human being who existed in a different time and place. In fact, it is an absurd notion to participate in a human being at all. In normal life we participate in groups of people, such as the church, but not a person himself. Brondos argues that the notion of participation in Christ destroys our individuality or makes Christ an impersonal power. He presents Christ as an ethical example and believes that salvation involves ‘an ethical decision and commitment on the part of believers.’

For the Torrances, salvation comes not through our identification with Jesus but rather his identification with us. The historical particularity of Jesus is the very basis of our inclusion in salvation. T.F. argues that the Church is not simply a group of individuals externally connected by the same moral ideals. External organisation cannot transform humanity; we rely wholly upon ontological renewal in Christ. Jesus did not attempt to restructure human systems of social, political and economic power. He went to the root of the problem, healing the human heart’s hostility towards God in himself and making us a new creation in union with God. Scripture presents salvation as an existing reality for those who are ‘in’ Christ rather than as a future aspiration for those who choose to follow his example (2 Cor. 5:17). Jesus said, “I am the way, the truth and the life” (John 14:6), not “I will show you the way…” If Jesus is merely an ethical example for us to follow, this throws us back upon ourselves to achieve our own salvation.

Conclusion

For T.F., these forensic and ethical conceptions of the atonement are indicative of ‘the Latin heresy’, which presents salvation in external terms. An external scheme is problematic because it distorts the nature of God and of humanity; it means that humanity cannot truly be saved, and it throws people back upon themselves to earn their own salvation.

---

23 Ibid., 155-66.
24 Ibid., 179.
25 T.F.T., Reconstruction, 82.
26 Ibid., 40-1.
T.F. argues that moral and legal frameworks are themselves part of the broken set of affairs between God and humanity. The moral and legal order actually serves to separate God and man. Both need to be redeemed and given a new basis through the atonement. As T.F. asks, according to what moral or legal order is it right for someone else to suffer and die in the place of others?27 When God is limited within human logical reasoning, the truth of the gospel is distorted. T.F. believes that our human rational faculties themselves need to be redeemed.28 We can only know God through His self-giving in Christ and atonement can only be worked out ontologically within the incarnate constitution of the Mediator.

Christ’s Person and Work

Padah, Kipper, Goel

Salvation is not worked out through external relations, the Torrances maintain, but through the self-giving of God in Christ, who assumed our humanity. They strongly believe that Christ’s person and work must be held together.29 T.F. discerns the importance of this in examining the three Hebrew terms, padah, kipper and goel, which give meaning to the word, apolutrosis [redemption], in the New Testament. Padah expresses God’s mighty and dramatic act of delivering Israel from bondage; kipper expresses God’s sacrificial offering to blot out sin; and goel expresses God’s person as a kinsman redeemer, who restores those in need to their lost inheritance.

Whilst the Eastern Orthodox Church has a strong understanding of the incarnational, ontological aspect of the atonement expressed by the concept of goel, T.F. laments that it is lacking in the Western church. As is evident from legal and moral theories of the atonement, Western theology tends to stress the act of God over His person. T.F. believes this to be a great problem because, when the emphasis is on the act of God, the human response is made to fall upon us, often seen in the form of having to make an existential decision for Christ. Seeking to redress this imbalance in the West, T.F. promotes the significance of the person of Christ, as our kinsman redeemer, who fulfils the human response in our place and on our behalf. For T.F., the three aspects of the atonement expressed by padah, kipper and goel, must be held together like the strands of a rope. The person of Christ is as significant as his work in redemption.

---

Hypostatic Union

The Torrances believe that redemption is not an external act of God, but worked out ontologically within the incarnate constitution of the person of Christ. Following Athanasius’ affirmation of the homoousion, central to their understanding of salvation is the hypostatic union in Christ: ‘Christ is one and the same being as God, as well as of one and the same being as ourselves.’ Christ must have a fully divine and fully human nature in order to save humanity.

First, humanity is incapable of saving itself; only God can save humanity. Therefore, if Jesus does not have a divine nature, there can be no salvation. Second, humanity is incapable of offering the perfect response to God. Therefore, it is necessary for Jesus to assume humanity and offer the perfect human response to God in our place and on our behalf. As T.F. writes, ‘He was the Word of God brought to bear upon man, but he was also man hearing that Word, answering it, trusting it, living by it – by faith.’ Jesus not only embodies God’s justifying act but also the human appropriation of it. As both God and man, Jesus fulfils both sides of the relationship between God and humanity.

Jesus’ assumption of humanity means that, by the Holy Spirit, humanity is able to share in everything that is his, that is, perfect union and communion with God. The hypostatic union in Christ resists an external conception of salvation, showing it to be an internal, ontological event.

The atoning mediation of Christ is thus to be expounded in terms of the internal relations between Christ and God and between Christ and all mankind. The 31 T.F.T., Mediation, 124. Colin Gunton is critical of T.F.’s stress on the homoousion as read through Western eyes, which he believes risks flattening out the particularities of the divine persons. See Colin Gunton, Father, Son & Holy Spirit: Toward a Fully Trinitarian Theology (London: T&T Clark, 2003), 50-1.

---

32 T.F.T., Mediation, 67.
34 Ibid.
35 T.F.T., Mediation, 66.
expiatory and propitiatory activity of the Mediator, while deriving from the innermost being of God, is fulfilled within the ontological depths of our fallen, enslaved, depraved and guilt-laden human existence, that is, in and through the oneness of God with us in our actual condition embodied in the incarnate existence of the Mediator.\textsuperscript{37}

\textbf{Incarnation and Atonement}

The significance of Christ’s person and of the hypostatic union means that Christ’s incarnation is the beginning of the atonement.\textsuperscript{38} T.F. writes that ‘the atonement begins from his very conception and birth when he put on the form of a servant and began to pay the price of our redemption’.\textsuperscript{39} In the very act of the divine nature bearing upon the human nature, it could not but be transformed: ‘In his holy assumption of our unholy humanity, his purity wipes away our impurity, his holiness covers our corruption, his nature heals our nature.’\textsuperscript{40} Here T.F. draws upon Athanasius; whilst the Arians saw Jesus’ humanity as a weakness, Athanasius considered it to be a strength. By assuming our humanity, Jesus was truly able to restore and renew us in the depths of our being.\textsuperscript{41}

In affirming the significance of the incarnation for the atonement, the Torrances have sometimes been misconstrued. First, they have been misrepresented as presenting an incarnational model in opposition to any forensic element. Donald MacLeod presents T.F. as

\begin{flushleft}
\textsuperscript{38} Ivor Davidson laments the neglect of the incarnation of Jesus and his humanity in modern Western theology, suggesting these diversions: ‘preference for experienced-based symbol; the fragmentation of biblical studies and dogmatics; the imperatives of contextual hermeneutics; and the preoccupation with methodology rather than substance’ (130-31). He recognises the necessity of the incarnation for Christ’s salvific efficacy: ‘Since Christology is not about ‘obscure metaphysics’... but the dramatic exposition of the encounter between God and humanity, the \textit{enhypostasia} narrates in realistic terms the history of the reconciliation which God effects in Jesus Christ... Without this, talk of disclosure, and of ‘solidarity’ in any ultimately transformative or redemptive sense, would be meaningless, for Jesus would not truly represent God to humankind or humankind to God. It is by his obedience within the terms of his humanity, not as an ideal, that the incarnate Word deals with sin and reconciles to God.’ (144). Although Davidson questions T.F.’s utilization of patristic theology, he upholds him as an example of articulating the atonement in a way that upholds both the person and work of Christ (144). See Ivor Davidson, ‘Theologizing the Human Jesus: An Ancient (and Modern) Approach to Christology Reassessed’ in \textit{International Journal of Systematic Theology} 3:2 (2001), 129-53.
\textsuperscript{39} T.F.T., ‘Latin Heresy’, 475.
\textsuperscript{40} T.F.T., \textit{Reconstruction}, 155-56.
\textsuperscript{41} T.F.T., \textit{Reconciliation}, 226-30.
\end{flushleft}
having ‘an aversion to any forensic idea of atonement’. However, did not deny the forensic element of the atonement in Scripture.

Second, they have been misconstrued as presenting a merely physical account of the atonement. Myk Habets believes that T.F.’s emphasis on the significance of the incarnation does lend towards a physical theory. However, Gunter Pratz contends that this is a misinterpretation, which unnecessarily polarises atonement by the incarnation of Christ and atonement by his death. Pratz argues that the person and work of Christ are inseparable, as indeed the Torrances maintain. T.F. clearly expresses that he did not believe that the incarnation alone effected salvation. He upholds the importance of Christ’s obedient life and sacrifice on the cross. Christ’s person and work are, for the Torrances, each necessary and inseparable.

The Torrances also seek to follow Athanasius and the Cappadocian fathers by asserting that Christ assumed fallen humanity. Again, this is contrary to the classic Western understanding which, from the fifth century, moved away from this belief. However, the Torrances believe that it is essential for Christ to have assumed fallen humanity in order for it to be transformed. They cite Gregory Nazianzus’ maxim that ‘the unassumed is the unredeemed’. J.B. asserts, ‘We are not just healed ‘through Christ’

---

42 Macleod, ‘Dr T.F. Torrance and Scottish Theology’, 67.
44 Habets, Theosis, 194.
47 T.F.T., Trinitarian Faith, 156.
48 Furthermore, it is the Torrances’ very emphasis on the incarnation that is vital in order to decry a physical theory. God’s assumption of humanity in Jesus leads to humanity being brought to its fullest reality; Jesus is the ‘personalising Person’ and the ‘humanising Man’. See T.F.T., Mediation, 78-9. This does not fit with a physical theory of redemption that immortalises humanity.
49 T.F.T., School of Faith, lxxv; J.B.T., ‘Christ in our place’, 47. Athanasius writes of the importance of Christ assuming the ‘whole man’, which does not necessarily mean that he meant fallen humanity, but it would be logically consistent.
50 According to the Torrance brothers, exceptions to the popular Western view in this regard include Martin Luther, Edward Irving, Karl Barth and H.R. Mackintosh. See T.F.T., ‘Latin Heresy’, 477; J.B.T., ‘Christ in our place’, 47.
51 T.F.T, Mediation, 49; J.B.T., ‘Christ in our place’, 47. See Gregory Nazianzen, Epistle 101. Gregory is referring to the human mind but it would be a logical extension to extend this to the whole fallen human nature.
because of the work of Christ but ‘in and through Christ’. For the Torrances, the incarnation is the beginning of the ontological transformation of our fallen humanity.

Dawson argues in support of the Torrances that it was necessary for Christ to assume a fallen human nature. He points to Jesus’ cry on the cross, “My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?” (Matt. 27:46), and his last words, “Father, into your hands I commit my Spirit” (Luke 23:46). He argues that these words indicate Jesus plumbing the depths of our fallen humanity and setting it aright through his perfect faithfulness to the Father.

However, T.F. is criticised by James Cassidy for affirming that Christ assumed fallen humanity. If Jesus is fully divine and yet assumed fallen humanity, Cassidy argues, this necessarily means affirming a sinful God: ‘If Jesus Christ – in his human and divine complex – is divinized (made to be of one substance with the Father), and if one aspect of that complex is sinful humanity, then would it not follow that God – at the incarnation – becomes sinful?’ Yet Christ’s assumption of fallen humanity does not necessitate a sinful God. Fallen humanity is transformed in the very act of the incarnation, as the holiness of Christ’s divinity bears upon unholy humanity. Therefore it can be affirmed that Christ assumed fallen humanity and yet God was not sinful.

Conclusion

The Torrances perceive that salvation cannot be worked out through external relations, but only through the self-giving of God in Christ, who assumed our humanity. The three Old Testament aspects of redemption, padah, kipper and goel, must be held together, and in particular the incarnational, ontological reality expressed by goel which has been overlooked on account of the tendency towards an external, legal paradigm. The hypostatic union in Christ enables Jesus to fulfil both sides of the relationship between God and man. In the very act of God assuming fallen human nature, humanity is being transformed. Jesus assumes humanity in order to plumb the depths of our fallen nature and turn it back to right relationship with God. Therefore, the incarnation is integral to the atonement; Jesus’ person must be held together with his work.

---

52 J.B.T., ‘Christ in our place’, 47.

Vicarious Humanity

Life and Death

According to the Torrances’ ontological scheme of salvation, Christ’s death on the cross is an ontological event, not an external transaction. By virtue of Christ assuming human flesh, all of humanity is included in his death. T.F. writes, ‘In Jesus Christ we have been crucified, have died and have been buried...’ In support of this ontological relation, J.B. points to Paul’s assertion, ‘one died for all and therefore all died’ (2 Cor. 5:14). The cross is an ontological event because, in Christ’s death, our old humanity dies, and the whole body of sin and death is destroyed. This challenges an external understanding of the salvific efficacy of Christ’s death, such as in the doctrine of penal substitution.

Furthermore, not only Christ’s death but his whole life is of atoning significance. ‘We are saved not only by the death of Christ which He suffered for our sake’, writes T.F., ‘but also by His life which He lived for our sake.’ In everything that Christ does, he is turning the human nature from its corruption back to a perfect relationship with God: ‘Throughout the whole course of his human life Jesus Christ was at work healing, sanctifying and humanising the human nature which he assumed from our fallen, dehumanised state, converting it from its estrangement from the Creator back to its proper relation to him.’

---

59 See Jeffery, Overy and Sach, Pierced for Our Transgressions.
60 T.F.T., School of Faith, lxxvi.
61 T.F.T., Mediation, 81. Although the Torrance brothers emphatically affirmed the salvific efficacy of the whole life of Christ, they do not engage in a comprehensive exposition of the gospel accounts of his life. Gunton comments of T.F., ‘...while the humanity of Christ is affirmed and used theologically in Torrance’s work, it is surprising how little interest is shown in the Christusbild, the detailed Gospel presentations of the life, death, resurrection and ascension of Jesus.’ However, Gunton acknowledges that it is a large project and he hopes that it might be undertaken by later generations. See Colin Gunton, ‘Being and Person: T. F. Torrance’s Doctrine of God’ in ed. Elmer Colyer, The Promise of Trinitarian Theology (Lanham: Rowman & Littlefield, 2001), 132-33. An example of this already being
This challenges an understanding of the atonement presented exclusively in terms of Christ’s death. 62

In affirming the salvific efficacy of Christ’s person and life, the Torrances have been the subject of criticism for not taking seriously enough Christ’s death on the cross and human sin and guilt. 63 Yet such a criticism reflects a superficial reading of the Torrances. First, T.F. and J.B. describe the cross as the supreme pinnacle of the atonement. J.B. writes, ‘The whole life of Jesus is a life of self-offering to the Father on behalf of the world, culminating in the one true sacrifice of love and obedience on the cross.’ 64 Similarly, T.F. asserts, ‘It was his whole life, and above all that life poured out in the supreme sacrifice of death on the Cross, that made atonement for sin, and constituted the price of redemption for mankind.’ 65 Indeed, a key Pauline teaching for T.F. is 1 Corinthians 2:2: ‘For I decided to know nothing among you except Jesus Christ, and him crucified.’ He reflects, ‘The Cross of Christ surely lies at the heart of our faith and of the mission of the Gospel. It is the centre of the Christian Gospel.’ 66 T.F. takes sin seriously, believing that the gospel of grace reveals the depth of sin and depravity in humanity; it is only when we have been put in the right with God that we can see it. 67 As for J.B., he often affirms that God’s grace demands a response and that Christ’s death leads us to repentance. 68 The Torrances therefore do take seriously Christ’s death and human sin and guilt.

63 Habets observes this criticism. See Habets, Theosis, 194. Gunther Pratz also identifies this criticism in Francis Watson, who argues that, if reconciliation commences at the hypostatic union, this diminishes the significance of Christ’s suffering on the cross. Watson cautions against such an approach, as he sees in Torrance, because a reconciliation stemming immediately and directly from the hypostatic union is difficult to unite with the necessity of his passion, a work marked by suffering and death, as narrated in the Gospels. See Francis Watson, “Did Christ die as our Substitute? Reconstructing the Logic of Atonement,” a paper presented in a seminar of the Research Institute in Systematic Theology, Kings College London (1993), cited in Pratz, ‘Relationship Between Incarnation and Atonement’.
64 J.B.T., Worship, 71.
65 T.F.T., Trinitarian Faith, 169.
67 T.F.T., Scottish Theology, 142-23.
68 J.B.T., ‘Covenant or contract?’, 55, 57.
Second, it is the Torrances’ articulation of both the person and work of Christ that ultimately takes Christ’s death and human sin and guilt more seriously than their critics. David W. Torrance argues,

Emphasis upon the vicarious humanity of Christ and the fact that we are saved through his life as well as his death, has troubled many evangelicals. They mistakenly believe that speaking of Christ’s vicarious humanity detracts from what took place on the cross. The very reverse is the case. By speaking of Jesus’ vicarious humanity we are actually magnifying what Christ did in reconciling us to God.69

D.W.T. argues that, in rejecting the significance of Christ’s whole life, evangelicals are just as erroneous as liberal theologians. When Christ’s death is abstracted from his person, it becomes an external remedy for sin which does not truly save humanity in its depths.70 For T.F., although an exclusive focus on the cross rightly highlights Jesus’ substitutionary death, it does not recognise the radical nature of Jesus’ substitution for us which spans his whole life.71 Death is a consequence of the corruption of humanity and therefore a part of human life which Jesus has to assume in order to redeem us. Christ not only saves us through his death, but from death. The Torrances emphasise Christ’s person in order to counteract this focus on Christ’s work in abstraction from his person. They perceive this abstraction to be inadequate because it renders the atonement as an external transaction between God and humanity which cannot effect a true transformation of the corrupt human nature.

Resurrection, Ascension, Pentecost

This tendency towards focusing on Christ’s death can overlook the significance of Christ’s resurrection, ascension and Pentecost. An example of this can be seen in the theology of John Stott. He describes Christ’s incarnation simply as a means to his death, and the cross as an external, legal transaction whereby God is conditioned to forgive humanity. For Stott, the function of the resurrection is to serve as proof that our sins have been dealt with by Christ’s death on the cross: ‘...what the resurrection did was to vindicate the Jesus whom men had rejected, to declare with power that he is the Son of God, and publicly to confirm that his sin-bearing death had been effective for the forgiveness of sins.\textsuperscript{72}

70 Ibid., 6.

For the Torrances, this is a deficient understanding of the atonement. The incarnation is not simply the means to the cross; humanity’s salvation depends upon our ontological union with Christ inaugurated by his birth into our humanity. Yet the union of God and man is not ontologically complete at the incarnation; rather it depends upon Christ’s life, death, resurrection, ascension and Pentecost.\textsuperscript{73} Christ’s resurrection is not simply confirmation of the forgiveness of sins, but the new birth of a righteous humanity in Christ. The cross alone is not the grounds of our justification; Paul writes that Christ ‘was raised for our justification’ (Rom. 4:25).\textsuperscript{74} Moreover, this verse indicates that new life through Jesus’ resurrection is an inextricable aspect of our justification: ‘[Christ] was delivered over to death for our sins and was raised to life for our justification’ (Rom. 4:25). T.F. asserts, ‘This means that the mighty act of God in the resurrection belongs to the very essence of atonement...’\textsuperscript{75}

Furthermore, the ascension is the indispensable counterpart to Jesus’ descent in the incarnation.\textsuperscript{76} At Christ’s ascension, our new humanity is raised up in Christ to share by the Spirit in his perfect relationship with the Father.\textsuperscript{77} J.B. writes, ‘The Son of God takes our humanity, sanctifies it by his vicarious life in the Spirit (John 17:17-18), carries it to the grave to be crucified and buried in him, and in his resurrection and ascension carries it into the holy presence of God.’\textsuperscript{78} T.F. therefore argues, ‘Ascension is not just an addendum to the story of Jesus, a bringing down of the curtain of his earthly life, but it is one of the great essential salvation events.’\textsuperscript{79}

Today the ascended Christ continues his vicarious ministry, in our place and on our behalf. He offers worthy worship, which we are unable to do, so that we might be included \textsuperscript{72} John Stott, \textit{The Cross of Christ} (Leicester: IVP, 1989), 238.

\textsuperscript{74} T.F.T., \textit{Atonement}, 127.
\textsuperscript{75} T.F.T., ‘Latin Heresy’, 474.
\textsuperscript{77} T.F.T., \textit{Reconstruction}, 151.
\textsuperscript{79} T.F.T., \textit{Reconstruction}, 151.
in his perfect relationship with the Father. J.B. laments that Christ’s continuing ascended high priesthood has been much neglected. He writes:

That life of worship and communion with the Father which Jesus fulfilled in our humanity, did not end in death. Having offered for us a life of perfect obedience to the Father, culminating in the one perfect self-offering for all people and all nations, Jesus rose from the dead and returned to the Father to intercede for us (Rom. 8:34) as our great High Priest (Heb. 4:14). As the eternal Mediator of an eternal covenant, he now appears on our behalf in the presence of God that we might be accepted as sons and daughters (Eph. 2:13ff., 1 Tim. 2:1-6, Heb. 4:14; 9:24; 7:25).

Pentecost too is essential to the atonement according to the Torrances. In his earthly life, Jesus receives the Spirit in order that, when he has ascended to heaven, he might pour it out upon humanity. J.B. considers that it is necessary for us to have the Spirit in order to participate in the divine life: ‘He pours out his Spirit on the Church at Pentecost to lift us up into that life of communion with the Father that we might participate in his glorified life...’ Thus T.F. writes, ‘...Pentecost must be regarded, not as something added on to atonement, but as the actualisation within the life of the Church of the atoning life, death and resurrection of the Saviour.’ This means that Christ’s death is not the sum of the atonement: ‘We are saved, therefore, not only by the death of Christ which he suffered for our sakes, but by his life which he lived in our flesh for our sakes and which God raised from the dead that we may share in it through the power of the Spirit.’

Retrospective and Prospective

A further problem of looking exclusively to Christ’s death is that this can lead towards a tendency to affirm the retrospective aspect of the atonement but overlook the prospective aspect. For the Torrances, salvation has both a retrospective and prospective aspect because humanity was included not only in Christ’s death, but also in his resurrection and ascension, and because of the event of Pentecost. This means that salvation involves not only a retrospective forgiveness of sins but a prospective sharing by the Spirit in Jesus’

---

80 J.B.T., ‘Christ in our place’, 45.
81 Ibid., 62.
82 J.B.T., Worship, 72.
84 T.F.T., Trinitarian Faith, 190.
85 Ibid., 155.
relationship with the Father. We are a new creation as sons and daughters of God.\textsuperscript{86} We have been adopted into Christ’s filial relationship to the Father.\textsuperscript{87} God does not deal with us in external terms; He created us for intimate communion with Him. T.F. asserts, ‘...it is not atonement that constitutes the goal and end of that integrated movement of reconciliation but union with God in and through Jesus Christ in whom our human nature is not only saved, healed and renewed but lifted up to participate in the very light, life and love of the Holy Trinity.’\textsuperscript{88}

T.F. writes of an ‘atoning exchange’ which is ‘worked out within the saving economy of the incarnation, and in the ontological depths of the humanity which he made his own, and therefore reaches its appointed end and fulfilment through his transforming consecration of us in himself and through his exaltation of us as one body with himself into the immediate presence of the Father.’\textsuperscript{89} Christ takes what is ours, sinful humanity, and gives us what is his, a perfect relationship with the Father. We are not only forgiven but, in Christ and by the Spirit, raised up to participate in the inner relations of God’s life.\textsuperscript{90} ‘Jesus received the Word of forgiveness for us from the Father, not only that our past sins might be wiped out’, wrote J.B., ‘but in order that we might receive the Spirit of adoption, and be restored to the status of sonship by a life of union with Christ...’.\textsuperscript{91}

T.F. believes that this perspective is faithful to the theology of the early church. Athanasius teaches that Christ has a twofold ministry: he mediates the things of God to man, and the things of man to God. He comes down to earth and assumes our humanity in order to raise humanity up to God by the Spirit.\textsuperscript{92} Athanasius’ famous dictum proclaims, ‘He became man that man might become god.’\textsuperscript{93} Similarly, Irenaeus writes, ‘Out of his measureless love our Lord Jesus Christ has become what we are in order to make us what he is himself.’\textsuperscript{94} T.F. believes that Western Latin theology has lost sight of Nicene theology in this regard:

\textsuperscript{86} T.F.T., Atonement, 133. See also McLeod Campbell’s filial understanding of the prospective aspect of the atonement. John McLeod Campbell, Nature of the Atonement, 151-91.
\textsuperscript{87} T.F.T., Reconciliation, 156.
\textsuperscript{88} T.F.T., Mediation, 77.
\textsuperscript{89} T.F.T., Trinitarian Faith, 179-81.
\textsuperscript{90} T.F.T., Mediation, 74-77.
\textsuperscript{91} J.B.T., ‘Christ in our place’, 50.
\textsuperscript{92} T.F.T., Mediation, 83.
\textsuperscript{93} St Athanasius, De incarnatione verbi dei, VIII:54.
\textsuperscript{94} T.F.T., Trinitarian Faith, 179.
The atoning exchange lies at the heart of Nicene theology, wherein the death and resurrection of Christ were neither separated nor treated in isolation from one another. Redemption was considered to have taken place not only through the death of Jesus Christ but also through the resurrection and ascension, so that redemption is not only release from death, bondage, and judgement but also the pathway to new life and freedom in God.\textsuperscript{95}

An external, judicial scheme neglects the profoundly filial nature of the prospective aspect of the atonement. Thomas Smail observes that the popular Western Latin understanding of the atonement does not do justice to God’s filial purposes for humanity whereby He adopts us as sons in order to enjoy an intimate relationship with Him:

Many of us have known a sin-soaked guilt-ridden evangelicalism where there has been a great deal of talk about the cost of our atonement in the blood of Christ and very little upon the free and loving grace of the Father who in his intense desire for the homecoming of sinners gave his Son. The God people have been shown is the righteous judge who requires the propitiation which Jesus alone can offer, and who in response to it can just manage to restrain his wrath against us provided those redeemed by Christ continue to behave in a moral and religious way. In such a context which is of course parody, but one that many people have absorbed as gospel, the ability to answer the grace and freedom of God’s forgiveness with a free and joyful heart... was one that to put it mildly did not come easily, and their confidence and expectation towards God was about as great as that of a man who expected a life sentence but has been put on probation for life instead. In such a context atonement has the smell of law fulfilled rather than of grace poured out.\textsuperscript{96}

The Torrances’ emphasis on the prospective aspect of the atonement offers an important corrective. An external understanding of the atonement ultimately cannot offer the prospective aspect because, without an ontological account of humanity’s inclusion in Christ’s resurrection and ascension, humanity cannot be truly transformed and lifted up to participate in the life of God.

\textsuperscript{95} Ibid., 180.
\textsuperscript{96} Thomas A. Smail, \textit{The Forgotten Father} (London: Hodder and Stoughton, 1981), 127.
Conclusion

The Torrances believe that Jesus’ whole life is of atoning significance, including the events of his death, resurrection, ascension and Pentecost. In Christ’s death, the old human nature dies; in his resurrection, humanity is reborn to new life; in his ascension, we are raised up to heaven in him; and at Pentecost, we receive the Spirit so that we might share by the Spirit in Jesus’ perfect relationship with the Father. An external, judicial scheme of salvation tends to look exclusively and narrowly to Christ’s death and the forgiveness of sins. It does not offer a filial account of the prospective aspect of the atonement, nor can it effect a true transformation of humanity. Whilst the Torrances are criticised for not taking seriously enough Christ’s death and human sin and guilt, it is their broader account of Jesus’ substitution which takes these most seriously.

Christ is our Righteousness

Active and Passive Obedience

An external, legal model of the atonement which tends to focus on Christ’s death and forgiveness of sins also typically affirms the imputation of Christ’s righteousness, on account of his active and passive obedience. The Torrances believe that we share in Christ’s righteousness on account of his active and passive obedience, yet they understand this in primarily personal, filial and ontological terms, rather than in abstract, external judicial terms.

For the Torrances, Christ’s active obedience is fulfilled in his obedience to the will of God and the law in perfect faithfulness, love, praise, trust and thanksgiving: ‘By active obedience of Christ is meant the positive fulfilment in the whole life of Jesus of his Sonship.’ Christ’s passive obedience is fulfilled in his submission to God’s judgement,

---

97 Bird, Saving Righteousness of God, 6. ‘The view of justification that fuelled the Reformation and has characterized Protestant dogmatics ever since consists of a specific conception of justification as the forgiveness of sins supplemented by the imputation of Christ’s righteousness to the believer.’ An example can be seen in Jeffery, Overy and Sach, Pierced for our Transgressions, 212-13, where the significance of Christ’s life is seen in terms of his fulfilment of the law so that his righteousness might be imputed to believers.

98 T.F.T., Reconstruction, 154.
ultimately leading to his death on the cross: ‘By passive obedience is meant the submission of Jesus Christ to the judgement of the Father upon our sin which he assumed in our humanity when he was ‘made under the Law’ in order to bear it in our name and on our behalf.’ Whilst the incarnational union deals with original sin, Christ’s obedience in life deals with our actual sins. However, the distinction between active and passive obedience is not a separation; they both begin in the incarnation and are led to fulfilment in Christ’s death and resurrection. On account of the hypostatic union, humanity shares in Christ’s active and passive obedience and therefore his righteousness.

Jesus’ obedience to the law, however, has been criticised for being a legalistic concept. N. T. Wright argues that, if Jesus fulfilled the law for us, this is works-righteousness, thus validating legalism. He proposes that Jesus’ obedience was not to the law but to God’s commission to bless the world. The believer partakes in Christ’s death and resurrection but not his righteousness. Rather, we ourselves fulfil the righteous demands of the law by means of the indwelling Spirit (Rom. 8:4).

Wright points out the danger of perceiving Christ’s obedience in legalistic terms. This is a problem that T.F. recognises in his own Scottish Reformed tradition:

...this notion of justification as a legal fulfilling of the contractual requirement of the covenant in respect of God’s eternal law, rather than as a gracious manifestation of the faithfulness of God embodied in the person of Christ, had a moralising effect upon the life and theology of the Kirk, which was particularly evident in the overwhelming attention given to the law, in comparison to the Gospel, and the call of the Larger Catechism for a detailed fulfilment of divine commandments.

However, a legalistic perspective is a misunderstanding of Christ’s obedience. Jesus was not obedient to the law in order to earn righteousness; he was obedient to the law in joyful response to the grace of God. His obedience should be understood in personal and filial terms rather than legal and conditional terms. Furthermore, Christ’s righteousness is

---

99 Ibid.
100 Torrance, Reconstruction, 154-56.
102 Ibid., 205.
103 Ibid., 208.
104 T.F.T., Scottish Theology, 144-45.
105 Cf. Alister McGrath’s observation that the Hebrew word for ‘righteousness’ has no English equivalent and has been understood in absolute, impersonal standards of justice and morality yet it not gained through external transaction; his obedience does not merit righteousness. His vicarious perfect obedience transforms the humanity which he assumes, turning it back to a right relationship with God: ‘...through his obedient Sonship he converted our disobedient human being back into true filial relation to the heavenly Father’.\footnote{T.F. writes of Christ’s fulfilment of the law in ontological terms, liberating humanity from evil:}

He came to fulfil all righteousness and to fulfil every jot and tittle of the law, acknowledging to the fullest extent the divine sanction in the law. He submitted himself under the law and was wholly obedient to the Father’s will in the life he lived on earth and in Israel. By his very holiness and perfect obedience sin had no power over him, and it was therefore as the holy one in entire fulfilment of the holy will of God that he invaded the domain of evil and redeemed us out of the power of darkness by his holy life and his holy submission to the Father’s will even unto the death of the cross.\footnote{Therefore, although it is possible to misinterpret Jesus’ fulfilment of the law, it cannot be equated with legalism. In fact, if Jesus’ fulfilment of the law is denied, it is this which can lead to legalism because we are thrown back upon ourselves to achieve it for ourselves.}

Jesus’ obedience must be understood in personal, filial and ontological terms.

\textbf{In Christ}

The Torrances’ personal, filial and ontological understanding of Christ’s righteousness challenges the notion of external, forensic imputation. In recent years, the notion of imputation has been hotly contested. Whilst theologians such as McGowan are concerned to maintain an external concept, some have sought to affirm it in more personal, participatory terms, others have dismissed the \textit{language} of ‘imputation’ and some have dismissed the concept altogether.

Robert Gundry has dismissed the notion of imputation, arguing that Paul never explicitly supports it. He argues that Paul usually attributes righteousness to God rather than Christ (except for 2 Pet. 1:1). Humanity must live its own obedient life of righteousness, Gundry insists, because there will be a final judgement of our works.\textsuperscript{109} D. A. Carson, however, responds to defend the notion of imputation, which he affirms in more personal, participatory terms. He argues that the antithesis between the righteousness of God and Christ is unnecessary for ‘God was in Christ reconciling the world to Himself’ (2 Cor. 5:19). Although Paul does not explicitly write of imputation, ‘in Christ’ language pervades his letters. In fact, Paul asserts that ‘Christ has become for us... our righteousness’ (1 Cor. 1:30). Thus Carson supports the notion of imputation but understands it in distinctively personal and participatory terms.\textsuperscript{110}

Mark A. Seifrid argues that the language of ‘imputation’ is deficient. It suggests a mere juridical declaration that makes justification a portioned out, isolated gift which detracts from Christ.\textsuperscript{111} Seifrid believes that this is far from the teaching of the Reformers and of Paul himself, who wrote in personal, Christological terms: ‘...we are justified by the redemption which is ‘in Christ Jesus’ (Rom. 3:24); his resurrection is our justification (4:25); through Christ we receive ‘the gift of righteousness’, the ‘justification which is life’ (5:17,18); Christ himself is our righteousness (1 Cor. 1:30); we become the righteousness of God in him (2 Cor. 5:21).’\textsuperscript{112} Therefore, Seifrid argues, ‘It is not so much wrong to use the expression ‘the imputed righteousness of Christ’ as it is deficient.’\textsuperscript{113}

Similarly, Michael Bird considers the language of ‘imputation’ to be misleading because it suggests a detached declaration which is external and abstracted from Christ. Whilst he argues that ‘imputation’ may be legitimately used to express the forensic aspect of justification, it must be recognised that the word itself is not used in the New Testament, where union with Christ is presented as the overarching framework to understand

\textsuperscript{111} Mark Seifrid, \textit{Christ, Our Righteousness: Paul’s Theology of Justification} (Downers Grove: IVP, 2000), 174.
\textsuperscript{112} Ibid.
\textsuperscript{113} Ibid., 175.
In order to better reflect the ‘in Christ’ language of Paul, Bird proposes the term ‘incorporated righteousness’.\textsuperscript{115}

T.F. uses the language of ‘imputation’ yet understands it in personal, filial and ontological terms.\textsuperscript{116} He argues that God does not give us abstract benefits; He gives us His very self: ‘Grace is to be understood as the impartation not just of something from God but of God Himself. In Jesus Christ and in the Holy Spirit God freely gives to us in such a way that the Gift and the Giver are one and the same in the wholeness and indivisibility of His grace...’\textsuperscript{117} We receive righteousness not through an external imputation of the benefits of Christ but through a personal participation in Christ’s very self. Paul asserts that Christ is our righteousness (1 Cor. 1:30). In the Old Testament the Spirit rests upon certain people at certain times (Num. 11:17), but in the New Testament at Pentecost the Spirit is poured out into humanity (Acts 2:4). Similarly, Abraham has righteousness credited to him (Rom. 4:3), but now we are united to Christ himself, who is our righteousness.\textsuperscript{118}

McGowan questions whether theologians such as T.F. should even be called Reformed when they present justification in terms of sharing in Christ’s righteousness, rather than in external, forensic terms.\textsuperscript{119} However, modern re-readings of Luther and Calvin have perceived a more participatory understanding of salvation in contrast to a simple external, judicial interpretation. For example, Marcus Johnson argues that Calvin’s

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{114} Bird, \textit{Saving Righteousness of God}, 70.
\item \textsuperscript{115} Ibid., 2-5, 60, 85.
\item \textsuperscript{116} T.F.T., \textit{Atonement}, 136. Cf. Marcus Johnson uses the language of imputation but with the qualification that Christ’s righteousness is imputed to us on account of our participation in Christ’s person. He warns of separating the gifts from the Giver, arguing that Christ does not merely perform the atonement; he is the atonement. See Marcus Johnson, ‘The Highest Degree of Importance: Union with Christ and Soteriology’ in Myk Habets and Bobby Grow ed., \textit{Evangelical Calvinism: Essays Resourcing the Continuing Reformation of the Church} (Eugene: Pickwick, 2012), 225-30.
\item \textsuperscript{117} T.F.T., \textit{Reality and Evangelical Theology}, 14-15.
\item \textsuperscript{118} Cf. From his exegesis of Galatians 2, Wiard Popkes argues that salvation should be understood in personal and participatory terms. Paul writes of being ‘in Christ’ and of Christ ‘in us’ (Gal. 2:20). Salvation therefore is not an external transaction but a person in whom we participate: ‘Christ is not just a saviour in the sense of helping out of a need. Rather, he is the very content of salvation; for Christ means life in its eternal quality of glory and love.’ See Wiard Popkes, ‘Two Interpretations of “Justification” in the New Testament Reflections on Galatians 2:15-21 and James 2:21-25’ in \textit{Studia Theologica} 59:2 (2005), 129-146.
\item \textsuperscript{119} McGowan, ‘Justification and the Ordo Salutis’, 14-17. Cf. Cassidy, ‘T.F. Torrance’s Realistic Soteriological Objectivism’, 184. However, a fundamental tenet of the Reformed church is ‘\textit{ecclesia semper reformanda est}’ (the church is always to be reformed). Alasdair Heron has also observed that T.F. did not follow people merely for the sake of tradition, according to his understanding of theology as ‘not the slavish following of any teacher or tradition, however brilliant or venerable, but the bringing of the mind into grateful subjection to the glorious revelation of the truth and reality of God in the light of him who for us and for our salvation came down... and was made man.’ See Alasdair Heron, ‘T.F. Torrance in Relation to Reformed Theology’ in Elmer Colyer ed., \textit{The Promise of Trinitarian Theology: Theologians in Dialogue with T. F. Torrance} (Lanham: Rowman & Littlefield, 2001), 44.
\end{itemize}
understanding of justification is forensic but not external. Righteousness is imputed to the believer on account of union with Christ. Therefore, Johnson grounds the forensic notion of justification in this primary participatory aspect. McGowan misrepresents the Torrances as denying any judicial aspect to the atonement. Michael Gorman has warned against the danger of creating a false antithesis between the judicial aspect of the atonement and a participatory understanding. As with the Torrances, Gorman argues, ‘The judicial image must be understood within a wider covenantal, relational, participatory, and transformative framework’ To use J.B.’s recurrent language, God’s dealings with humanity in salvation demonstrate ‘the priority of grace over law, the filial over the judicial’.

Ontological

Protestant theology established a forensic doctrine of imputation whereby the believer is declared to have an alien righteousness in reaction to the Roman Catholic belief that justification involves an infused moral transformation. To the Roman Catholics, this external doctrine of imputation can appear to be a ‘legal fiction’. However, some Protestant theologians have turned to a doctrine of imputation which is transformative, understanding God’s declaration as a creative act.

The Torrances argue that righteousness is not an external legal status, but involves a true transformation, on account of the vicarious humanity of Christ. The notion of imputation is empty, T.F. insists, unless it is understood in terms of transformative, ontological union. The work of Christ cannot be separated from his person. The hypostatic union in Christ shows justification to be a real ontological event rather than an 120 Johnson, ‘Highest Degree of Importance’, 238-40.

---

123 Ibid., 55.
125 This view is upheld by John Piper. See John Piper, Counted Righteous in Christ: Should we abandon the imputation of Christ’s righteousness? (Wheaton: Crossway, 2002).
126 Roman Catholic and Eastern Orthodox theology typically understand salvation in transformative rather than external, legal terms. Roman Catholic theology typically understands the transformation in moral terms and Eastern Orthodox theology in ontological terms. See Kärkkäinen, One with God, 33.
external, legal status. Justification is transformative because humanity is included in Christ’s resurrection. T.F. points to the story of the healing of the paralysed man; Jesus forgives his sins, commands him to rise and walk, and the man is healed (Mark 2:1-12). ‘Justification is not only a declaratory act’, T.F. argues, ‘but an actualization of what is declared. When Christ said to the paralysed man that his sins were forgiven, they were forgiven – as the word of healing made clear.’¹³⁰ T.F. believes, ‘When, therefore, the Protestant doctrine of justification is formulated only in terms of forensic imputation of righteousness or the non-imputation of sins in such a way as to avoid saying that to justify is to make righteous, it is the resurrection that is being bypassed.’¹³¹ The resurrection is evidence that justification is a creative event.¹³² Humanity is raised to new life in Christ, which means that there is a real ontological transformation. An external, forensic notion of justification cannot effect a true re-creation of humanity through Christ’s death and resurrection.

Bruce McCormack seeks to uphold a judicial and transformative understanding of Christ’s righteousness without recourse to the Torrances’ notion of participation in Christ’s vicarious humanity. He supports the forensic doctrine of imputation but argues that the ontology is underdeveloped: ‘At its heart, forensicism is deeply ontological’.¹³³ He seeks to show how a judicial understanding of imputation can be transformative without the Torrance’s ontology of participation in Christ’s humanity.¹³⁴ McCormack contends, ‘I do not participate in the historical humanity of Christ...; rather I participate in the kind of humanity which Jesus instantiated and embodied through his life of obedience.’¹³⁵ For McCormack, union with Christ should be understood as ‘a union of wills.’ Our life conforms to Christ’s as far as our will corresponds to his. McCormack explains, ‘The being of the Christian “in Christ” is to be construed along the lines of the conformity of my life to his life of obedience, which brings about his likeness in me.’¹³⁶ The ethical is ontological, he argues, because our being is constituted in part by what one does.¹³⁷ McCormack writes, ‘...a judicial act for God is never merely judicial; it is itself transformative.’¹³⁸

¹³⁰ Ibid., 62.
¹³¹ Ibid., 63.
¹³² Ibid.
¹³⁴ Ibid., 84.
¹³⁵ Ibid., 110. Webster is supportive of McCormack. See Webster, ‘Rector et iudex’, 55.
¹³⁶ McCormack, ‘What’s at stake’, 110.
¹³⁷ Ibid., 113.
¹³⁸ Ibid., 107.
The difficulty with McCormack’s argument is that it seems to present union with Christ as something that comes about by our own action. Yet we are not ‘in Christ’ on account of our own obedience. Paul writes of being united to Christ in his death and resurrection (Rom. 6), which indicates that our union with Christ does not depend upon our own activity. By no action of our own are we able to birth ourselves. There is also the question of how our actions are able to conform to Christ’s if our very being has not first been transformed. An external, ethical or judicial framework simply cannot transform humanity.

Conclusion

An external, forensic understanding of the atonement typically presents justification in terms of the imputation of Christ’s righteousness on account of his active and passive obedience. The difficulty with this is that it prioritises the judicial over the filial and cannot offer a true righteousness to humanity. T.F. uses the language of imputation but understands it in personal, filial and ontological terms. Christ’s obedience is not an external transaction that merits righteousness; his perfect obedience transforms the humanity that he assumes vicariously, turning it back to a right relationship with the Father. The person and work of Christ must be held together; God does not give us abstract benefits, but His very self. We receive righteousness not as an external legal status but by participating in Christ himself. This means that we have a true righteousness rather than a mere external, legal status. The hypostatic union in Christ shows justification to be a real ontological event. Justification is transformative because humanity is included in Christ’s resurrection and reborn to new life. Without the Torrances’ concept of the vicarious humanity of Christ and our participation in his righteousness, there is the danger of being thrown back upon ourselves to make ourselves righteous.139

Justified by Faith

Existential Decision

The gospel calls us to receive by faith this salvation objectively achieved through Christ’s vicarious humanity. In the oft-proclaimed words of John, ‘For God so loved the world that he gave his only Son, so that everyone who believes in him may not perish but may have eternal life' (John 3:16). When Jesus is asked, “What must we do to do the works God requires?”, he answers, “The work of God is this: to believe in the one he has sent” (John 6:28-29). Paul writes of being ‘justified by faith’ (Rom. 3:28; 5:1; Gal. 2:16; 3:24; Eph. 2:8), asserting, “…if you confess with your lips that Jesus is Lord and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved. For one believes with the heart and so is justified, and one confesses with the mouth and so is saved” (Rom. 10:9-11). The gospel therefore challenges us to make a decision for Christ.

139 This danger can be seen in Gundry, Wright and McCormack.

However, this gospel call is distorted by preaching and teaching today which makes faith a condition of salvation. Salvation is presented as a potentiality that can only be actualised by our faith. An example of this may be seen in Wayne Grudem’s description of ‘saving faith’:

There must be some basic knowledge or understanding of the facts of the gospel. There must also be approval of, or agreement with, these facts. Such agreement includes a conviction that the facts spoken of the gospel are true, especially the fact that I am a sinner in need of salvation and that Christ alone has paid the penalty for my sin and offers salvation to me. It also includes an awareness that I need to trust in Christ for salvation and that he is the only way to God, and the only means provided for my salvation. This approval of the facts of the gospel will also involve a desire to be saved through Christ. But all this still does not add up to saving faith. That comes only when I make a decision of my will to depend on, or put my trust in, Christ as my saviour.

According to Grudem’s scheme of salvation, our faith conditions God into responding with forgiveness: ‘...God must respond to our faith and do what he promised...’. Similarly, Paul Helm argues that justification only occurs when a person has faith: ‘Men are justified by faith’. The implication is clear. Until a person believes, he is not 140 T.F.T, Mediation, 103; J.B.T., ‘Introduction’, Nature of the Atonement, 3-4. Cf. ‘The doctrine of justification came to be seen as dealing with the question of what an individual had to do in order to be saved’, Alister McGrath, Historical Theology (Oxford: Blackwell, 1998), 185; ‘...this doctrine has always carried with it the risk of turning faith into another kind of work’, Richard Hays, The Faith of Jesus Christ: An investigation of the narrative substructure of Galatians 3:1-4:11 (Chico: Scholars Press, 1983), 139; and Eberhard Jüngel’s observation that faith is often understood in terms of making a ‘decision for God’, Eberhard Jüngel, Justification: The Heart of the Christian Faith (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 2001), 238. Cf. Douglas Campbell’s more recent criticism of this problem in Campbell, Deliverance of God.

---

142 Ibid., 722.
justified, even though Christ has rendered satisfaction for sin. A person is not justified before he believes, but upon believing.\(^{143}\) For Helm, our response of faith is necessary in order to be justified.

T.F. calls this ‘the modern notion of salvation by existential decision, which perceives our faith and decision to be the means to secure salvation.\(^{144}\) He observes, ‘...Evangelical Protestantism has developed a way of preaching the Gospel which distorts and betrays it by introducing into it a subtle element of co-redemption.’\(^{145}\) When our faith is necessary to secure our justification, people are thrown back upon themselves to work up enough faith. This is an immense burden which can lead to weariness and a lack of assurance in salvation.

Vicarious Faith

The Torrances understand the gospel call to faith in relation to the vicarious humanity of Christ. Justification is not a potentiality to be actualised by our faith; salvation is an accomplished reality in Christ:

> In Jesus Christ God has actualised his unconditional love for you in your human nature in such a once for all way, that he cannot go back upon it without undoing the Incarnation and the Cross and thereby denying himself. Jesus Christ died for you precisely because you are sinful and utterly unworthy of him, and has thereby already made you his own before and apart from your ever believing in him. He has bound you to himself by his love in a way that he will never let you go, for even if you refuse him and damn yourself in hell his love will never cease.\(^{146}\)

Therefore, salvation is not dependent upon our believing or faith. ‘It is not faith that justifies us’, T.F. asserts, ‘but Christ in whom we have faith.’\(^{147}\)

This does not mean that the Torrances diminish the gospel call for us to respond with faith.\(^{148}\) Rather, it means that faith cannot be understood according to logico-causal

---

\(^{143}\) Helm, Calvin and the Calvinists, 77-78.

\(^{145}\) Ibid.

\(^{147}\) T.F.T., God and Rationality, 58.

categories. Our response of faith is a participation in a response already made in our place and on our behalf by Christ. J.B. writes, ‘Our response in faith and obedience is a response to the Response already made for us by Christ to the Father’s holy love, a response we are summoned to make in union with Christ.’ Indeed, our response is only made possible by Christ’s all sufficient response. Our decision for Christ is a response to Christ’s prior decision for us, a ‘yes’ to Christ’s ‘yes’ to God on our behalf. As J.B. puts it, ‘He chose us, not we him.’

In his vicarious humanity, Christ has faith for us, so that we are liberated from the impossible task of trying to work up enough faith for ourselves. Christ lives a life of perfect faithfulness to the Father in our place and on our behalf and continues to intercede for us as our ascended high priest. T.F. asserts,

Jesus Christ is not only the Word of God become flesh, He is also Believer, but Believer for us, vicariously Believer, whose very humanity is the embodiment of our salvation. In Him who is Man of our humanity, we are graciously given to share, and so to participate in the whole course of His reconciling obedience from His birth to His death. That He stood in our place and gave to God account for us, that He believed for us, was faithful for us, and remains faithful even when we fail Him again and again, is the very substance of our salvation and the anchor of our hope.

Although faith is usually perceived to be our role in salvation, it is not an autonomous, independent act. T.F. writes, ‘Faith in Christ involves a polar relation between the faith of Christ and our faith, in which our faith is laid hold of, enveloped and upheld by his unswerving faithfulness.’

---

150 T.F.T., Incarnation, 26. Cf. Jüngel writes of faith not as an independent, determining decision for God but as an acknowledgement that the decision has already been made for humanity in Christ. See Jüngel, Justification, 241-45.
152 J.B.T., Worship, 18.
154 T.F.T., ‘Preaching Jesus Christ’, 25. T.F. used the analogy of his daughter who held tightly to his hand when learning to walk. Just as she did not rely on her feeble grasp but upon his strong grasp, we do not depend upon the adequacy of our own faith but upon Christ. See T.F.T., Mediation, 93.
There is ongoing debate in scholarship as to how to translate the occurrences of Πίστις Χριστοῦ in the New Testament.155 The genitive case may be translated as the ‘faith of Christ’ or ‘faith in Christ’. T.F. holds to a subjective genitive translation of Galatians 2:20: ‘It is no longer I who live, but it is Christ who lives in me. And the life I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me.’ For T.F., the subjective genitive reflects the centrality of Christ’s faithfulness, which is the foundation for ours.156 He also examines the words for ‘faith’ in both the Old and New Testament, finding that their meaning points to humanity’s dependence upon the steadfastness of God.157 He concludes, ‘God draws man within the sphere of His own faithfulness and righteousness and gives man to share in it, so that his faith is embraced by God’s faithfulness.’158

Grudem, on the other hand, assumes an objective genitive translation of Galatians 2:20: ‘...And the life I now live in the flesh I live by faith in the Son of God.’159 The debate over translation is significant because an objective genitive can encourage the notion of salvation by existential decision, whereby people are thrown back upon themselves to work up enough faith for salvation. Indeed, Grudem’s description of ‘saving faith’ reflects this notion of salvation by existential decision, presenting faith as a condition of salvation.

---

156 C.F.D. Moule criticises T.F.’s subjective genitive translation because he sees it to disparage the response of the human will. Moule argues that our faith is necessary to subjectively lay hold of our objective justification. See C.F.D. Moule, ‘The Biblical Conception of ‘Faith’ in The Expository Times 68 (1957), 157. However this is a misunderstanding of T.F. because he does not disparage the human act but rather argues that it is only made possible as a response to Christ’s all-sufficient substitution in our place and on our behalf.

158 Ibid., 113.

159 Grudem, Systematic Theology, 56. However, an objective genitive translation here seems implausible in light of its context. The context provides no support for the belief that Paul is referring to humanity’s faith in Christ. Rather, the centrality of Christ’s redemptive work and the dismissal of human endeavour is clear: ‘I have been crucified with Christ; and it is no longer I who live, but it is Christ who lives in me...’ (2:19-20).
Stephen Chester seeks to defend the objective genitive translation of Πίστις Χριστοῦ from this criticism. He argues that the objective genitive does not necessarily lead to an anthropocentric soteriology because Luther holds to the objective genitive whilst also offering a thoroughly Christological account of faith.\(^\text{160}\) In response to Chester, it may be affirmed that the notion of ‘faith in Christ’ is not wrong in itself.\(^\text{161}\) The Torrances are emphatic about the necessity of our own faith. However, the problem is that a Christological account of faith can be neglected in preaching and teaching, which means that an objective genitive translation can serve to further a false notion of salvation by existential decision. When our faith is abstracted from Christ’s vicarious faith in which we participate, there is the danger of an anthropocentric soteriology.

Furthermore, there are compelling reasons for translating Πίστις Χριστοῦ as a subjective genitive. Richard B. Hays has considered the significance of the whole framework of Paul’s thought for the Πίστις Χριστοῦ debate.\(^\text{162}\) Paul’s theological language is rooted in a narrative substructure: the story of Christ.\(^\text{163}\) This story is presupposed and also developed throughout his writing to include Paul and his churches in a progressing narrative.\(^\text{164}\) This narrative framework has often been overlooked because Paul’s letters are ‘manifestly non-narrative texts’.\(^\text{165}\) Yet this narrative framework, argues Hays, provides an underlying direction to Christ’s faith, rather than our own.

...because justification hinges upon this action of Jesus Christ, ...it is a terrible and ironic blunder to read Paul as though his gospel made redemption contingent upon our act of deciding to dispose ourselves towards God in a particular way. The “grammar” of Paul’s gospel—more precisely, of the gospel’s topical sequence—places humanity in the role of “Receiver”\(^\text{166}\).

Hays’ argument is supported by Douglas Campbell’s interpretation of Πίστις Χριστοῦ in Romans 3:21-22 which, he argues, evokes the gospel narrative of Christ’s death and resurrection. Campbell believes that it is functionally equivalent to other references to the passion in terms of language. He argues that Paul is therefore referring to Christ’s \(^{160}\) Chester, ‘It is No Longer I Who Live’, 334.

\(^{161}\) For T.F., verses such as Galatians 2:16, 20 and 3:22 should not be presented in terms of an either/or debate between Christ’s faith or ours. The issue is the primacy of Christ’s faithfulness to man’s faith, which answers and participates in it. See T.F.T., ‘One Aspect’, 113.
\(^{162}\) Hays, Faith of Jesus Christ, 1.
\(^{163}\) Ibid., 73-4.
\(^{164}\) Ibid., 266.
\(^{165}\) Ibid., 247.
\(^{166}\) Ibid., 240.
faithfulness even to death in order to reveal God’s righteousness. Campbell translates Romans 3:21-22: ‘But now, irrespective of the law, the righteousness of God has been disclosed and it is attested by the law and the prophets, the righteousness of God through the faith of Jesus Christ for all who believe.’ Campbell’s interpretation is compelling when considering the wider context of the passage. Paul continues, ‘Then what becomes of our boasting? It is excluded’ (Rom. 3:27). This surely emphasises the insufficiency of our own endeavours and our dependency upon Christ.

Campbell, Deliverance of God, 612-13.

Another disputed passage is Galatians 3:22, which Hays translates as follows: ‘But the Scripture has imprisoned all things under the power of sin, so that what was promised through the faith of Jesus Christ might be given to those who believe’ (Hays, 247). He argues that the wider context supports this translation; Paul writes that Christ ‘gave himself for our sins to set us free’ (1:4), which recalls the notion of recapitulation in Romans 5. This underlines the belief that Jesus’ faith is not merely an example for us to emulate but actually salvifically efficacious (Hays, 248). Earlier Paul asks, ‘Did you receive the Spirit by doing the works of the law or by believing what you heard?’ (Gal. 3:2). This is exegetically ambiguous because Paul may have meant that the Spirit is received by faith rather than works, or he may have meant that the Spirit is received by neither faith nor works. Hays contends for the latter interpretation because the juxtaposition of works and faith is not as credible as works and law. It is more convincing that Paul is contrasting human activity with God’s activity rather than one human activity with another. It is also supported by 3:5, where the syntax indicates that the prepositional phrases are modifiers of God’s action (Hays, 143-7). Thus the emphasis is on God’s action, not human capability. Paul also writes, ‘Now it is evident that no one is justified before God by the law; for ‘The one who is righteous will live by faith’ (Gal. 3:11). ‘The one who is righteous’ takes a singular adjective and it may have been used by Paul as a title for the Messiah (cf. Acts 3:14; 7:52; 1 Pet. 3:18; 1 John 2:1). Paul also asserts that Christ is the answer to the problem of humanity’s unfaithfulness (Gal. 3:23-26) (Hays, 173). Furthermore, Paul is quoting Habakkuk 2:4, which was interpreted messianically by the LXX translation (Hays, 150-1). This indicates that 3:11 is highlighting the significance of Christ’s faith in contrast to our incapacity to earn our justification. Paul stresses Christ as the only heir to God’s promise to Abraham and that we participate in this inheritance ‘in Christ Jesus’ (Gal. 3:14-16) (Hays, 153). We are all justified through Christ’s faith (Hays, 157). The Πίστις Χριστοῦ references in both Galatians 3:22 and Romans 3:26 have a clear parallel to the faith of Abraham in Romans 4:16. Logically, it is incoherent to affirm that believing in Jesus is the basis of the promise to Abraham. It is more cogent to affirm that Jesus’ faith is the basis of the promise (Hays, 164). Elsewhere, Paul considers Jesus’ obedience to have salvific efficacy for us (Rom 5:19; Philippians 2:8) (Hays, 166). In addition, Hooker observes that there is no reference to the faith of the believer when Paul writes of righteousness established by Christ in Romans 5:19 (Hooker, 336). In the next chapter, Paul asks, ‘Now, however, that you have come to know God, or rather to be known by God, how can you turn your back again...?’ (Gal 4:9). Paul initially depicts the Galatians as active knowing subjects but then revises his words to place the emphasis on God, perhaps as an intentional rhetorical device. Thus those who believe depend upon the believing of Christ (Hays, 240). As Paul asserts, ‘Everything is from God, who reconciled us to himself through Christ’ (2 Cor 5:18). Hooker considers that Paul teaches that we become sons of God because Christ is Son of God (Rom 8; Gal 4); that our righteousness and holiness is dependent upon Christ’s righteousness and holiness (2 Cor 5:21; 1 Cor 1:30); and that the spiritual gifts, including faith, depend upon life in Christ (Gal 5:22). Thus she concludes that it follows that our faith is also dependent upon his (Hooker, 324). Campbell also provides support for Hays in observing the grammatical singularity in Gal 3:23: ‘Now before faith came, we were imprisoned and guarded under the law until faith would be revealed.’ The single event of coming in relation to a single subject supports the interpretation that Paul is referring to the faith of Christ, not the faith of all believers (Campbell, 879).
Morna Hooker makes six key observations about the occurrences of Πίστις Χριστοῦ: (1) all of the passages refer to Jesus, evoking his earthly ministry; (2) they refer to Πίστις Χριστοῦ as the ground of existence for the believer; (3) they also refer to the believer’s faith, which would make a second reference to ‘faith in Christ’ redundant; (4) the passages contrast righteousness based on the Law with righteousness based on Πίστις Χριστοῦ and the logical antithesis to works of the Law in us is the faith of Christ; (5) they concern being in Christ; and (6) they also concern the death of Christ.¹⁶⁹ This strongly suggests that Paul is referring to the salvific efficacy of the ‘faith of Christ’, in which we participate.

Hooker also draws upon Paul’s theology in other passages to support the argument that our faith is a sharing in Christ’s faith. In 2 Corinthians 1:17-22, Paul defends himself against an accusation of faithlessness, arguing that he shares in the faithfulness of God through Christ, the very embodiment of God’s faithfulness. Leading up to 2 Corinthians 4:13, Paul writes that his ministry involves participation in Jesus’ death and resurrection, and then he writes that he shares in the ‘same spirit of faith’ as Jesus.¹⁷⁰ Hooker writes,

In Paul’s view, Christians owe everything to the fact that they are in Christ: they are nothing and they have nothing, except by virtue of being in him. Christian faith is always the response to what God has done in Christ and to what Christ is. It seems, then, that they need the faithfulness of Christ—for how are they to have even faith, except by sharing in his?¹⁷¹

Therefore, there are compelling arguments to affirm a subjective genitive translation of Πίστις Χριστοῦ. It is a significant debate because the subjective genitive points to the centrality of the faith of Christ, and thereby challenges an external, anthropological notion of salvation by existential decision.

Conclusion

The gospel call to receive our salvation by faith can be misunderstood as presenting faith as a condition of salvation. T.F. calls this ‘salvation by existential decision’, whereby our faith is deemed an autonomous, independent act which brings about our justification. Yet justification is not a potentiality to be actualised by our faith; salvation is an accomplished reality in Christ. Humanity has been saved in Christ prior to any decision of our faith. Furthermore, in his vicarious humanity, Christ has faith for us, and our faith should be understood as a participation in his perfect faithfulness.

¹⁷⁰ Ibid., 334-35
¹⁷¹ Ibid., 337-38.

There is compelling evidence to translate the occurrences of Πίστις Χριστοῦ in the New Testament as a subjective genitive, which reflects the centrality of Christ’s faithfulness as the foundation for ours. This debate is significant because an objective genitive translation can advance the pervasive notion of salvation by existential decision, whereby people are thrown back upon themselves to work up enough faith for salvation. In affirming the vicarious faith of Christ, we are liberated from striving to have faith and worrying that we do not have enough for salvation; rather we are free to joyfully participate by the Spirit in Christ’s perfect faithfulness to the Father.

Conclusion

The Torrances present God’s claiming of humanity as an ontological event within the incarnate constitution of Christ. He assumes humanity to plumb the depths of our fallen humanity and turn it back to right relationship with God. The hypostatic union in Christ enables Jesus to fulfil both sides of the relationship between God and man. Thus the incarnation is integral to the atonement; Jesus’ person is essential to his work. This challenges external, forensic models of the atonement which distort God’s primarily filial purposes for humanity and cannot effect a true transformation of our very being. People are thrown back upon themselves to attempt to earn their salvation, which can lead to weariness and a lack of joy and assurance.

For the Torrances, Jesus’ whole life is of atoning significance, including the events of his death, resurrection, ascension and Pentecost. In Christ’s death, the old human nature dies; in his resurrection, humanity is reborn to new life; in his ascension, we are raised up to heaven in him; and at Pentecost, we received the Spirit so that we might share in Jesus’ perfect relationship with the Father. This challenges an external, forensic scheme which tends to look exclusively and narrowly to Christ’s death and the forgiveness of sins. Without this wider conception of the atonement, an external scheme cannot effect a true transformation of humanity, nor can it offer this profoundly filial account of the prospective aspect of the atonement.
The Torrances offer a personal, filial and ontological understanding of Christ’s righteousness. His life of perfect faithfulness is not an external transaction which merits righteousness; rather it transforms the humanity that he assumes vicariously, turning it back to a right relationship with the Father. His resurrection is the rebirth of a new humanity. This challenges the notion of an external imputation of Christ’s righteousness. The difficulty with this is that it prioritises the judicial over the filial and cannot offer a true righteousness to humanity. The Torrances argue that we receive righteousness not as an external legal status but by participating in Christ himself, which means that we are truly made righteous.

The gospel call to faith is understood by the Torrances as a participation in Christ’s prior response on our behalf. Christ has faith for us, and our faith is included and upheld in his continuing perfect faithfulness. This challenges the notion of salvation by existential decision whereby faith is understood as an autonomous, independent, logico-causal act which brings about our justification. People are then thrown back upon themselves to make a decision for Christ or work up enough faith. The Torrances show that salvation does not depend upon the adequacy of our own faith; rather we are set free to enjoy the reality of our inclusion in Christ and his perfect relationship with the Father by the Spirit.

Justification is not a potentiality to be actualised by our faith; salvation is an accomplished reality in Christ:

In Jesus Christ we have been crucified, have died and have been buried – and so the old age, the power of darkness and the sovereignty of evil are already defeated. In Christ Jesus we have been resurrected, made alive; we are already justified and sanctified and redeemed for he has been made our wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption; already we have been reconciled to God; already have peace with God, already our life is hid with Christ in God, and already we have been granted all things necessary for life and godliness that we might have participation in the divine nature.172

This is a profoundly objective view of the atonement which gives us assurance of salvation and rest from trying to obtain it ourselves. Yet it also raises questions regarding the elusive role of the Holy Spirit and of our subjective human participation and these will be explored as the Spirit comes into greater focus in the next chapter.

172 T.F.T., Atonement, 134-35.
3

Drawn to Participate by the Holy Spirit: Objective over Subjective

The Torrances’ scheme of salvation is radically Christocentric. Everything pertaining to our salvation has been accomplished in the vicarious humanity of Christ, even our response to God and our faith in Him. The Torrances’ scheme of salvation is also radically objective. Redemption is wholly an act of God, which sets our human autonomy aside. This objective, Christocentric scheme of salvation is a radical claim which does not go uncontested. It raises the question of whether salvation is reduced to a noetic concept whereby epistemology essentially defines what it means to be saved. Furthermore, in the recent rise of Western interest in the Holy Spirit, some theologians have sought to give greater attention to the Spirit, and believe that the Spirit in turn grants humanity an important, subjective, autonomous role in salvation. They seek to affirm a greater salvific role for the Spirit and for humanity in our response of faith and in our works in anticipation of final judgement.

In the Torrances’ scheme of salvation, the Holy Spirit has a pervasive but elusive role, often expressed in the simplest of terms: ‘by the Spirit’. It is ‘by the Spirit’ that Jesus lived a vicarious life of perfect faithfulness to the Father in our place, and it is ‘by the Spirit’ that humanity is brought to share in Jesus’ communion with the Father.¹ For the Torrances, this is appropriate to the self-effacing nature of the Spirit, whose role is ultimately to draw us up in Christ to participate in the Triune life. This personal, relational and participatory scheme of salvation defies the Spirit being utilised to promote any autonomous human activity, which can only lead to us being thrown back upon ourselves. It is the contention of this chapter that the Holy Spirit is the means by whom humanity is unconditionally adopted into the divine life, with liberating, intimate and transformative consequences.

The Spirit of Christ

Christocentricity

Whilst the Eastern Orthodox tradition has a strong pneumatological underpinning, both Protestant and Catholic tradition is considered to be more Christologically focused.2 This Christological focus is true to affirm of the Torrances’ theology, which has the vicarious humanity of Christ at its centre:

Everything in the message of the Gospel, and everything in the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, hinges upon the concrete mediatorial activity of Christ in space and time, for it is through the incarnate parousia of the Son of God in Jesus that the activity of God in its nature and reality is revealed to us and its saving power is actualised among us in the Spirit whose coming to us is made possible on the ground of Christ’s atoning and reconciling work.3

This raises the question of whether the Torrances’ scheme of salvation is too Christocentric, to the detriment of their pneumatology. Rankin argues that T.F. is subject to the charge of Christomonism.4 Yet this is an unfair charge; the Torrances’ soteriology presents humanity being drawn up by the Spirit in Christ to participate in his relationship with the Father. This is an unmistakably Trinitarian scheme of salvation.5

---

4 Rankin, ‘Carnal Union’, 289.
The Torrances’ scheme of salvation is certainly Christocentric, yet T.F. is unapologetic of this because he believes that Christ is the appropriate axis of theology and that this is faithful to Nicene theology.\textsuperscript{6} He writes,

It is the incarnation of the Word which prescribes to dogmatic theology both its matter and its method, so that whether in its activity as a whole or in the formulation of a doctrine in any part, it is the Christological pattern that will be made to appear. That does not mean that all theology can be reduced to Christology, but because there is only one Mediator between God and man, the Man Christ Jesus, in the orderly presentation of the doctrines of the Christian faith, every doctrine will be expressed in its inner coherence with Christology at the centre, and in its correspondence to the objective reality of God’s revelation in Jesus Christ who is true God and true Man.\textsuperscript{7}

Furthermore, this Christocentricity does not detract from the Holy Spirit, but rather upholds His significance. J.B. writes,

It is as if the whole purpose of the Incarnation, Death, Resurrection and Ascension, is in order that we might receive the Holy Spirit, that the Triune God of grace might bring to fulfilment the purposes of creation in sanctifying our humanity in Christ, that we might be brought into a life of holy communion, a life of prayer.\textsuperscript{8}

Thus T.F. asserts, ‘...it is in and through the humanity of Christ in all that he has done for us that the Holy Spirit is conveyed to us, so that the Holy Spirit is given along with the incarnation of the Son a place of central significance in the structure of Christian theology.’\textsuperscript{9}

Therefore, whilst the Torrances’ scheme of salvation is Christocentric, concentrated upon the vicarious humanity of Christ, this is appropriate to the method of their theology and actually serves to uphold rather than diminish the significance of the Holy Spirit.

\textsuperscript{6} T.F.T.,\textit{ Trinitarian Faith}, 62-63.
\textsuperscript{7} T.F.T.,\textit{ Reconstruction}, 128-29.
Mutual Mediation

Christ and the Spirit are inseparable in the Torrances’ scheme of salvation. T.F. writes of a ‘mutual mediation’ of Christ and the Spirit. Christ mediates the Holy Spirit to humanity by vicariously receiving the Spirit in human flesh at his baptism, and then pouring out the Spirit upon all of humanity at Pentecost. Yet the Holy Spirit also mediates Christ because it is by the Spirit that Christ assumes human flesh, vicariously lives a life of perfect faithfulness, offers his life as a perfect sacrifice, resurreets our humanity and ascends to heaven. The Spirit is ‘the Spirit of Christ’ who unites humanity to Christ and lifts us up to participate in the Triune life. This means for T.F. that to be ‘in the Spirit’ is the same as to be ‘in Christ’.

However, commentators are divided as to whether this is an adequate account of the Spirit’s role in salvation. Some extol T.F. for having a rich pneumatology. Kye Won Lee asserts that ‘The Spirit is the hero behind the curtain of Torrance’s theological stage’. Yet others seek a fuller pneumatological account. Whilst in support of the Torrances’ Christology, Ivor Davidson calls for ‘a more overt statement of the Spirit’s action in, upon and towards the human Jesus’. Habets makes a similar call, arguing that without an adequate account of the Spirit’s action on Jesus’ humanity, T.F. runs the risk of the docetic or Apollinarian heresy:

10 T.F.T., Reconstruction, 245-46. Regarding the gap between Christ’s baptism and Pentecost, T.F. believed that humanity was becoming accustomed to bear the Holy Spirit but was not ready until atonement was completed: ‘Jesus Christ was himself the Bearer in our human nature of the fullness of the Spirit, but the Spirit in this his new mode of presence and activity could not be transmitted to others when they were yet in their sins or be received by others until atonement for sin was completed and the Mediator took his place on the throne of God in his consecrated and glorified Humanity.’ (247).
11 Ibid., 246-47.
12 Ibid., 221; J.B.T., ‘The Priesthood of Jesus’, 172; ‘Covenant or contract?’, 75.
15 Kye Won Lee, Living in Union, 316.
By positing too great an emphasis on the agency of the divine Word on the human nature of Jesus, as opposed to a relation mediated by the Holy Spirit, Torrance implicitly makes the human nature of Christ merely instrumental. It would be too much to suggest that Torrance’s christology is docetic or Apollinarian, but his lack of pneumatology in this area does risk bringing him to the brink of such a failing...

Certainly, a fuller discussion of the Spirit’s action upon Jesus’ humanity would be beneficial for a better awareness and understanding of the Spirit’s action upon our own humanity today. J.B. believes that ‘As Christ was anointed by the Spirit in our humanity to fulfil his ministry for us, so we are united by the same Spirit to share his ministry’. A closer exploration of the Spirit’s action upon Jesus would aid and empower us in this ministry. This may be the benefit of a Spirit Christology. As Clark Pinnock considers, ‘...while Logos Christology highlights how different we are from Jesus, Spirit Christology underlines how like him we can be. The Father sends us as he sent Jesus, filled with the Spirit. The power that was at work in Jesus is at work in us.’ A more detailed examination of the Spirit’s action upon Jesus’ humanity would be a welcome endeavour.

There have also been calls to answer the ‘how’ questions of the Spirit’s role in salvation. Maurice Bevan argues that a fuller account of the role of the Spirit is needed to explain how humanity is ontologically transformed in Christ. Similarly, Habets argues that T.F.’s articulation of theosis lacks a sufficient discussion of the role of the Spirit: ‘...he does not go far enough in articulating the actual dynamics of how the Holy Spirit ‘deifies’ believers in practice’.

Deddo has recognised this unsatisfying gap of knowledge regarding pragmatics but he argues that, for T.F., such ‘how’ questions are incoherent. For example, we simply cannot

---

17 Habets, Theosis, 71.
18 J.B.T., ‘Christ in our place’, 51.
19 Cf. Smail: ‘It is when we think of the humanity of Jesus in terms of the operation of the Holy Spirit, that we can see its possibilities for us who, from the same fleshly starting point, and by the same power, can be made wholly new men in Christ.’ See Thomas Smail, Reflected Glory: The Spirit in Christ and Christians (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1975), 71.
20 For example, Clark Pinnock seeks to highlight how the Spirit actively works in every aspect of Christ’s life and mission. See Clark Pinnock, Flame of Love: A Theology of the Holy Spirit (Downers Grove, Intervarsity Press, 1996). A compelling Spirit Christology is also proposed by Myk Habets, who proposes a fuller account of the Spirit which does not diminish the place of Christ but complements it. He advocates the work of Moltmann, Smail, Ralph del Colle, David Coffey and Gary Badcock. See Myk Habets, ‘Spirit Christology: Seeing in Stereo’ in Journal of Pentecostal Theology 11:2 (2003), 199-234.
21 Pinnock, Flame of Love, 111.
23 Habets, Theosis, 196; Cf. 152.
know how Jesus was conceived by the Spirit in Mary’s womb. The ultimate answer that can be given to such ‘how’ questions is simply that it is ‘by the Spirit’. Deddo writes, Referring to the agency of the Holy Spirit as the ultimate answer goes against the grain of modern Western habits of mind which seeks impersonal, causal, or instrumental means as explanation. For the most part agency has been eliminated from the category of being essential to explanation. But for Torrance the Triune agency in perichoretic communion is the ultimate explanation.

The Self-effacing Spirit

It has been a common criticism of Western theology that it has an underdeveloped pneumatology. T.F. himself asserts, ‘It may be admitted that the doctrine of the Holy Spirit is the weakest of all the doctrines of the Church, for it has never been given the disciplined attention it requires.’ However, in recent years, there has been a rise of Western interest in the doctrine of the Holy Spirit. Karl Barth dreamed of:

...the possibility of a theology of the third article, a theology where the Holy Spirit would dominate and be decisive. Everything that one believes, reflects, and says about God the Father and God the Son in understanding the first and second articles would be demonstrated and clarified basically through God the Holy Spirit, the vinculum pacis between the Father and the Son.

---

25 Ibid., 106.
27 T.F.T., School of Faith, xcv.
28 Kärkkäinen, ‘Introduction’, Holy Spirit and Salvation, xix. He proposes that the surge of pneumatological studies is due to a better awareness and understanding of Eastern Orthodox theology and of the Pentecostal-Charismatic movement (see p.xi). For example, see Michael Welker ed. The Work of the Spirit: Pneumatology and Pentecostalism (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006); Frank D. Macchia, Justified in the Spirit: Creation, Redemption and the Triune God (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2010).
29 Karl Barth, The Theology of Schleiermacher (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1982), 278.
With a ‘theology of the third article’, Lyle Dabney has called for what has been put last in the creed to be put first in modern theological enterprise. Dabney perceived a theology of the first article of the creed in medieval Scholasticism, which had great confidence in the capacity of our created nature to attain knowledge of God. He perceived the sixteenth-century Reformation to then inaugurate a theology of the second article, by protesting this Scholastic belief in an innate capax Dei and affirming that right relationship with God is established only by grace through Christ. Dabney argues that the current age, having changed culturally, socially and intellectually, has rejected Scholasticism’s created rationality and finds the Reformation’s protest meaningless. To address this post-Christendom age, Dabney calls for a theology centred on the Holy Spirit.\(^{30}\)

However, a theology centred on the Holy Spirit would be at odds with T.F.’s account of the person and work of the Spirit. For T.F., the Holy Spirit is ineffable and self-effacing, pointing away from Himself to Christ and the Father:

> Like Christ the Holy Spirit is one in being and of the same being as the Father, but unlike Christ the Holy Spirit is not one in being and of the same being as we are, for he incarnated the Son but does not incarnate himself, he utters the Word but does not utter himself. He directs us through himself to the one Word and Face of God in Jesus Christ in accordance with whom all our knowledge of God is formed in our minds, knowledge of the Spirit as well as of the Father and of the Son. This is the diaphanous self-effacing nature of the Holy Spirit who hides himself, as it were, behind the Father in the Son and behind the Son in the Father, but also the enlightening transparence of the Spirit who by throwing his eternal Light upon the Father through the Son and upon the Son in the Father, brings the radiance of God’s Glory to bear upon us.\(^{31}\)

This self-effacing nature of the Spirit may be the reason why, according to critics, a satisfactory pneumatology has not been articulated in Western theology in general or in

---

T.F.’s theology more specifically.\textsuperscript{32} For T.F., the lack of a more comprehensive pneumatology in his work reflects his belief in the ineffable nature of the Spirit.\textsuperscript{33}

Conclusion

Although some have criticised the Torrances’ scheme of salvation for being too Christocentric to the detriment of the role of the Spirit, Christ is the appropriate axis of theology and actually serves to uphold rather than diminish the significance of the Holy Spirit. There is a mutual mediation of Christ and the Spirit to humanity. Christ mediates the Holy Spirit through his baptism and Pentecost and the Holy Spirit mediates Christ by empowering his life and uniting us to him.

In one sense the Torrances’ pneumatology is rich for the Spirit is integral to every aspect of salvation, yet more could certainly be articulated regarding the Spirit’s action upon Jesus’ humanity. This would aid a better understanding of the Spirit’s action upon our own humanity today. However, the Holy Spirit is ineffable and self-effacing, pointing away from Himself to Christ and the Father. This means that practical specifics regarding the Spirit are essentially indefinable.

Our Human Response

Onto-relational

The radical objectivity and Christocentricity of the Torrances’ account of salvation raises questions regarding our human response by the Spirit. According to the Torrances, the whole human race has been united to Christ on account of his vicarious humanity. This has incurred the criticism that this negates the subjective actualisation of our union by the Spirit.

James Cassidy contests the Torrances’ belief that a person could be united to Christ without his own subjective contribution of faith by the Spirit.\textsuperscript{34} For Cassidy, a person is \textsuperscript{32} Furthermore, perhaps this is the reason why, as Habets has observed, pneumatology has been the least examined aspect of T.F.’s theology. See Habets, Theosis, 140.

\textsuperscript{33} This same suggestion has been made by Deddo and confirmed by T.F. See Deddo, ‘The Holy Spirit’, 103-4; T.F.T., ‘Thomas Torrance Responds’, 312.
united to Christ only when he has made a response of faith by the Spirit. He writes, ‘For [T.F.] Torrance, “union with Christ” is swallowed up by “union in Christ.” The unio mystica disappears into unio hypostasia and the ordo salutis is collapsed into the historia salutis.’

Similarly, Rankin argues that the Torrances’ objective understanding of union with Christ does not do justice to our human activity or the activity of the Spirit. In so doing, Rankin foresees the repercussion that Christ becomes ‘relevant to everybody and meaningful to none’. He writes, Especially in our day and age, will a doctrine including a constraint of nature, which to many ears might smack of determinism, touch modern women and men isolated and abandoned in our overcrowded cities? Do they not want to hear that God in the flesh is there for them, choosing to love them, volunteering to save them, personally and individually, rather than by a doctrine that involves a contingent necessity of nature? Will that make them feel like merely one of the herd?

However, Cassidy and Rankin’s critique fails to recognise the significance of the Torrances’ objective account of union with Christ. If union with Christ depended upon subjective human appropriation, this would throw us back upon ourselves to achieve salvation, an impossible task. T.F. is acutely aware of this problem, which he perceives in the Westminster Catechisms:

In the Westminster theology the main focus of attention is upon man’s appropriation of salvation through justifying faith... Ultimately the main content of these Catechisms is concerned with man’s action, man’s obedience, man’s duty toward God, man’s duty to his neighbour, and man’s religion, although undoubtedly all that is directed upward in a most astonishing way to the glory of God. But it is man’s glorification of God that occupies most of the picture.

In addition, this union with Christ is essential in order for humanity to be ontologically transformed and therefore truly saved from the depths of our corruption. Thus Christ can

---

36 Ibid., 193.
37 Rankin, ‘Carnal Union’, 286.
38 Ibid., 293.
39 Ibid.
40 T.F.T., School of Faith, xvii – xviii.
only really be meaningful if we have been united to him in this ontological and objective way.

Furthermore, from this essential objective basis, the Torrances do distinguish between an ontological relation to Christ and a pneumatological relation to Christ. We are in ontological relation to Christ on account of his incarnation and vicarious humanity. However, an ontological relation alone leads to universalism. Universalism is precluded by the New Testament call for a human response of faith by the Spirit. Thus J.B. writes of the necessity of a pneumatological relation to Christ in order to enjoy our ontological relation to Christ:

On the grounds of our ontological relation to Christ, our Second Adam, we are called through the Holy Spirit into union with Him. Without Pentecost and without the sealing of the Holy Spirit in faith, we cannot regard ourselves as members of Christ’s Body and partakers of His blessings.

There is one union with Christ but two modes of relating to Christ. Our ontological union with Christ is a fait accompli; we cannot reverse its reality. However, we can live in ignorance or denial of this or we can live in agreement with it and enjoy its reality. It is the role of the Spirit to open us up within our subjectivities for Christ so that we live out of ourselves and in Him. T.F. believes that humanity’s objective union with Christ is subjectively actualised in us by the Spirit. J.B. writes, ‘Therefore we have to hold two things together. First, he has already taken our humanity into the Holy of Holies, the presence of the Father in his own person. Second, he comes to us today by the Holy Spirit to take us with him into the Holiest of All...’. J.B. follows Calvin in identifying three ‘moments’ of the one work of salvation by God:

The confession of faith of the believer is to say that our salvation is made actual by the work of the one God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit. It is from beginning to end entirely the work of God’s grace, but within that one work there are three great ‘moments’ – the moment of eternity, the eternal love of the Father; the moment of history, when Christ died and rose again nineteen hundred years ago to fulfil for us in time God’s eternal purpose, so that (in Calvin’s phrase) ‘all parts

---

42 Ibid.
43 T.F.T., Reconstruction, 238.
44 T.F.T., Mediation, 77.
of our salvation are complete in Him'; the moment of experience when the Holy Spirit unites us to Christ and brings us to personal faith and repentance.

Therefore, the unio mystica is not indistinguishable from the unio hypostasia and the ordo salutis is not collapsed into the historia salutis. Yet there is unity in the diversity because if there is not only one work of salvation, we are thrown back upon our own efforts to achieve it for ourselves. For the Torrances, the believer’s activity of faith by the Spirit is imperative, yet it depends upon the prior ontological union made by Christ. As Timothy Dearborn writes:

Salvation is onto-relational. It is neither solely ontological, as if it were an automatic, impersonal intrinsic encounter with God either through his cosmic presence... Nor is it solely relational, as if it were an extrinsic encounter through faith without any ontological change in people in Christ. Both the ontological and the relational dimensions must be affirmed for an adequate understanding of salvation.

Participatory

The Torrances believe that a response of faith by the Spirit is necessary for the subjective actualisation of our objective ontological union in Christ. However, in order to show that this is not a burden for humanity, they emphasise that Christ has already made this response of faith by the Spirit vicariously in our place. For some, this appears to diminish our own 47 Cf. Colin Gunton: ‘Our union with the person of Christ, which Calvin called an unio mystica, presupposes the hypostatic union, but does not reduplicate it’. See Colin Gunton, ‘Being and Person: T. F. Torrance’s Doctrine of God’ in Elmer Colyer ed., The Promise of Trinitarian Theology: Theologians in Dialogue with T. F. Torrance (Lanham: Rowman & Littlefield, 2001), 147. Cf. ‘Two possible mistakes need to be avoided here. One is to reduce the unio hypostatica downwards to the unio mystica. This is the typical mistake of modern liberal theology. The other moves in the opposite direction by dissolving the union mystica upwards into the unio hypostatica. This is the typical mistake of various high sacramental ecclesiologies. By seeing the unio hypostatica as absolutely sui generis and the unio mystica as pertaining to our union with the person of the incarnate Son by virtue of our participation in his vicarious humanity, Torrance preserves their proper distinction, and so the proper unity-in-distinction (and distinction-in-unity) between Christ and his Church’ (159).

---

human response by the Spirit and the Torrances have been criticised for not giving this adequate appreciation.\(^{49}\)

Thomas Smail argues for a greater appreciation of our own human response by the Spirit to Christ’s response for us. In so doing, Smail is keen to avoid semi-Pelagianism, and does not wish to suggest that we are co-authors of our salvation. He writes, “We have to believe for ourselves, but we cannot believe by ourselves. The freedom to believe is the work and gift of the Spirit in his incorporating others into what Christ has done.”\(^{50}\) With much modern Christianity overemphasising our human response, Smail commends T.F. for showing that our response is wholly dependent upon Christ’s prior response on our behalf.\(^{51}\) However, Smail wishes to emphasise that the Spirit enables us to make our own response to Christ.\(^{52}\)

Smail is critical of T.F. for diminishing the role of the Holy Spirit and the effect that this diminishment has on the value of our human response.\(^{53}\) He argues that, whilst the Spirit is the Spirit of Christ who effects in humanity what is achieved in Christ, the Spirit also has His own personal action apart from Christ, calling forth one’s own personal response to Christ. Christ receives the Spirit from the Father and responds to the Father in the Spirit; we too receive the Spirit from Jesus and respond in the Spirit to the Father through Jesus. For the human response to be authentic, it must be our own. Peter’s confession of Christ depends upon Jesus’ prior response to God, yet it is nevertheless true that Peter makes the confession himself (Matt. 16:13-20). Therefore Smail argues that Christ’s response alone is not enough; we must respond for ourselves through the Spirit. He argues that the failure of T.F. to differentiate between Christ’s response and our own response is a consequence of a further failure to differentiate the work of Christ and the Spirit. He believes that T.F.

\(^{49}\) Moltmann has made this criticism more generally of the Reformed tradition. He proposes that the personal decision of faith is a crucial pneumatological counterpart to Reformation Christocentricism. He argues that the Reformation doctrine of justification lacks an adequate account of humanity’s role through the Holy Spirit. Its Christological focus limits the work of the Holy Spirit to merely conveying the knowledge of salvation. Wishing to uphold the necessity of freedom in the Spirit, Moltmann proposes a greater stress on the human response of faith. See Jürgen Moltmann, The Spirit of Life: A Universal Affirmation (Minneapolis: Fortress Press, 1992), 149-50; 116.

\(^{50}\) Thomas Smail, ‘Third Person Singular – The Trinitarian Spirit’, Presidential Address to the annual meeting of the Scottish Church Theology Society, Crieff, 10-14 January 2011.

\(^{51}\) Smail, Giving Gift, 109-11.

\(^{52}\) Ibid., 174.

\(^{53}\) Ibid.
emphasises what Christ does objectively for us at the expense of what the Spirit does in us so that we are able to subjectively appropriate our salvation.54

However, Smail’s criticism appears to be founded on a logico-causal misunderstanding of T.F.’s profoundly participatory scheme of salvation. Christian D. Kettler has defended T.F. from Smail’s criticism, suggesting that Smail mistakenly understands the human response according to the Newtonian principle of cause and effect. Smail conceives of our response by the Spirit as the result of Christ’s response. Yet for T.F., our response by the Spirit is not simply the result but a very participation in Christ’s response for us. Thus Christ and the Spirit cannot be so easily separated. The Spirit enables us to participate in Christ’s response. Kettler considers that Christ’s radical substitution is difficult to accept because it is thought to deprive us of freedom. However, he argues that the objectivity of Christ and the Spirit does not displace our humanity, but rather truly establishes it.55 As T.F. asserts, ‘Far from crushing our creaturely nature or damaging our personal existence, the indwelling presence of God through Jesus Christ and in the Holy Spirit has the effect of healing and restoring and deepening human personal being.’56

Although Smail wishes to avoid semi-Pelagianism, there is an inherent danger in stressing our own autonomous human response in logico-causal terms. This can lead to the belief that our human response has salvific efficacy, which throws people back upon themselves. The Torrances’ emphasis on Christ’s all-sufficient response in which we participate by the Spirit excludes any synergistic notion of co-redemption.

Whilst a greater appreciation of the Spirit is often championed by those who wish to see more of an emphasis on our human response, the Spirit does not enable us to make our own autonomous response to Christ, but to participate in Christ’s response for us.57 Frank Macchia promotes an emphasis on the Spirit over against an emphasis on our human response of faith.58 Like the Torrances, he conceives of our human response in participatory terms.59 He argues that ‘pneumatology has the potential to help us see how justification can

54 Ibid., 108-12.
56 T.F.T., Trinitarian Faith, 230.
57 See for example Moltmann, The Spirit of Life, 149-50; 116.
59 Ibid., 230.
be both theocentric and open to creaturely participation.\footnote{Ibid., 217.} Thus a greater appreciation of the Spirit’s role actually counteracts an autonomous, anthropological emphasis.

The Sacraments

The Torrances understand our human response by the Spirit as a participation in Christ’s perfect response on our behalf, rather than as an autonomous logico-causal act. Yet this concept of participating in Christ’s response has also been questioned, for it challenges our human rationality. Kye Won Lee reflects,

> There seemingly remains something like an enigma, even if it is not [T.F.’s] genuine intention, in regard to the relation between the objective realities which God has once and for all accomplished for all of humanity in Jesus Christ and our subjective response to or acceptance of them.\footnote{Kye Won Lee, Living in Union, 313.}

Rankin has expressed dissatisfaction with Kettler’s response to Smail, arguing that it does not get to the root of the problem of how our human response relates to Christ’s response. Rankin argues that T.F. ‘fails to articulate a proper relation between the response of human beings and Christ’s vicarious response for them’.\footnote{Rankin, ‘Carnal Union’, 286.} Rankin believes that T.F.’s account of the human response is lacking in an account of its specific nature.\footnote{Ibid., 287.}

> It is true that there is ‘something like an enigma’ regarding how our human response is a participation in Christ’s vicarious response. Yet comprehending this enigma is not necessary; what is important is that it liberates humanity from the burden of earning salvation, so that we can freely share by the Spirit in Christ’s relationship with the Father.

> Moreover, whilst T.F. does not explain this enigma, he does write very practically about how we participate in Christ’s vicarious response. The sacraments of baptism and the Eucharist are tangible expressions of our participation in Christ. Of the Eucharist, T.F. writes:

> This union of Jesus Christ with us in body and blood by virtue of which he became our Priest and Mediator before God demands as its complement our union with him in his body and blood, in drawing near to God and offering him our worship with, in and through Christ, while his continuous living presentation of us before the Father on the ground of his one perfect all-sufficient sacrifice calls for our continuous living communion with him as the Son. It is in this union and communion with Christ the incarnate Son who represents God to us and us to God that the real import of the Lord’s Supper becomes disclosed, for in eating his body and drinking his blood we are given to participate in his vicarious self-offering to the Father.

The sacraments of baptism and the Eucharist point to the objective reality of salvation by God’s grace alone. Baptism is indicative of Christ’s once-for-all finished work of death and resurrection, whilst the Eucharist is indicative of our continuing participation in Christ. Both rule out any notion of human co-operation in salvation. George Hunsinger writes,

No secondary form can do anything more than manifest, attest, mediate, and participate in the one central form, precisely because Christ’s finished work of salvation, being once for all, perfect, and all-sufficient, allows for no supplementation, repetition or increase. In its perfection, however, the finished work of Christ (opus perfectus) does allow for secondary forms of self-manifestation, self-attestation, and self-mediation (i.e., Word and Sacrament) which participate in the central form without becoming confused with or changed into it (operatione perpetuus).

Thus the sacraments bring to expression our participation in Christ’s all-sufficient response.

Conclusion

The radical objectivity and Christocentricity of the Torrances’ account of salvation has aroused the criticism that it diminishes the role of the Spirit and our human response. If the whole human race has been united to Christ on account of his vicarious humanity, this raises the question of whether subjective actualisation by the Spirit is negated. However, the Torrances have an onto-relational understanding of salvation. They strongly believe that the believer’s activity of faith by the Spirit is imperative, yet they perceive that it depends upon the prior ontological union made by Christ. This radically objective union is the basis of our ontological transformation and is essential in order to avoid being thrown back upon ourselves to achieve salvation.

---

64 T.F.T., Reconciliation, 111.

If Christ has offered the perfect response of faith by the Spirit in our place, this raises the question of whether our own human response by the Spirit is diminished. However, whilst a greater appreciation of the Spirit is often championed by those who wish to see more of an emphasis on our human response, the Spirit does not enable us to make our own autonomous response to Christ, but to participate in Christ’s response for us. The problem with an autonomous logico-causal response is that this also throws people back upon themselves to earn salvation. The Torranges understand our human response by the Spirit as a participation in Christ’s response, rather than as an autonomous logico-causal act. This participatory scheme, rather than diminishing our humanity, truly establishes it.

The notion of our human response as a participation by the Spirit in Christ’s response may appear to be somewhat of an enigma. Yet it is essential to the liberation of humanity from the burden of earning salvation, so that we can freely share by the Spirit in Christ’s relationship with the Father. Whilst it is a difficult concept to comprehend, it comes to tangible expression in the sacraments of baptism and the Eucharist, whereby we participate in Christ’s once-for-all (baptism) and continuing (Eucharist) vicarious response.

Works and Final Judgement

Final Judgement

The Torranges’ objective, Christocentric view of salvation raises the question of whether this diminishes the significance of our human works by the Spirit for the last judgement. In the Torranges’ scheme of salvation, full judgement has already taken place in Christ. In his perfect obedience, Jesus submits to God’s judgement against sin. The hypostatic union in Christ means that he is both ‘God the judge judging sin’ and ‘man the judged submitting perfectly to God’s holy judgement’. T.F. describes this judgement in absolute terms:

---

It was the full realisation of the holy will of God in our human nature, the full meting out of the divine condemnation against sin, the full outpouring of the divine love into and upon human nature. But in Christ Jesus all that was also gladly suffered and endured for our sakes, so that in him there was achieved in judgement, in complete and final justification, a judgement, a union between God and humanity which death and hell itself could not break or in any way surrender. Nothing could isolate Jesus as man from God, not even the final judgement of God, for Jesus as man was God himself come as man.\textsuperscript{70}

This is a very real and total judgement, which exposes humanity’s guilt, yet it involves a profoundly ‘positive act of acceptance’ in that God chooses to be on humanity’s side in Christ and reconcile us to Himself.\textsuperscript{71} T.F. writes, ‘That if you like is the paradox of the cross: that the divine assumption of our judgement is our most complete judgement, and yet it is in no sense a rejection of humanity, but its very reverse, an entire acceptance of man for Christ’s sake, in the blood of Christ.’\textsuperscript{72}

This acceptance of humanity is irrevocable: ‘To reverse it would be to bring Christ back to the cross again, and to deny the reality of what he has already done.’\textsuperscript{73} Since God has taken the rejection upon Himself in Christ, now ‘there is no positive act of rejection or judgement extended toward any human being, but only the act of acceptance.’\textsuperscript{74} This means that those who are in hell are there of their own volition. God has accepted them but, inconceivably, they have refused to acknowledge His acceptance.\textsuperscript{75} Since all of humanity is unconditionally accepted by God, this raises the question of whether this diminishes the significance of our works by the Spirit.

\textbf{Works}

Paul writes to the Corinthians, ‘We must all appear before the judgement seat of Christ, so that each of us may receive what is due us for the things done while in the body, whether good or bad’ (2 Cor. 5:10). Paul writes to the Romans that ‘God will repay each person according to what they have done’ (Rom. 2:6) and to the Galatians that ‘a man reaps what he sows’ (Gal. 6:7). There are numerous different perspectives as to the relationship

\textsuperscript{70} Ibid., 125.
\textsuperscript{71} Ibid., 155-56.
\textsuperscript{72} Ibid., 156.
\textsuperscript{73} Ibid., 157-58.
\textsuperscript{74} Ibid., 156-57; Cf. J.B.T., ‘The Priesthood of Jesus’, 170.
\textsuperscript{75} T.F.T., Atonement, 157.
between our works by the Spirit and final judgement. In recent years proponents of the New Perspective on Paul have roused debate by arguing that our works by the Spirit are a necessary condition for final justification.

Wright argues that there has been a neglect of Paul’s teaching on a final judgement according to works (Rom. 2:6, 13; 8:1, 13; 14:10-12; 1 Cor. 6:9; 2 Cor. 5:10; Gal. 3:4f.; 5:19-21). Wright, who believes that the notion of Jesus fulfilling the law for us is essentially works-righteousness, contends that we ourselves must fulfil the demands of the law by the Spirit. Humanity has an active and essential role to play in faith and works, inspired by the Spirit (Phil. 2:12, 3:12, 4:13; Col. 1:29).

Wright also perceives a neglect of the Holy Spirit in the Reformed doctrine of justification. He argues that, if the role of the Spirit is overlooked, the burden falls upon human striving for assurance. Wright insists that we cannot add our own works to the finished work of Christ. He writes, ‘Please note: this is not the logic of merit. It is the logic of love... Within the logic of love is the rich, theological logic of the work of the holy spirit.’ In Wright’s scheme, the Spirit is at work through a person, who paradoxically at the same time acts in freedom (1 Cor. 15:10).

Although Wright wishes to avoid a merit-based salvation, stressing our empowerment by the Spirit, there is nevertheless the danger of throwing people back upon themselves by the idea that our works are a condition for final justification. If we await a final justification dependent upon our works, this runs the risk of breeding a lack of assurance because there is an element of uncertainty regarding our salvation. People then 77 Wright, Justification, 159-61.

---

78 Ibid., 208. For a refutation of Wright’s belief that Jesus’ fulfilment of the law is works-righteousness, see chapter two of this thesis.
79 Ibid., 129-30; 33.
80 Ibid., 210.
81 Ibid., 165.
82 Ibid., 163.
84 Cf. Guy Prentiss Waters who argues that Wright is essentially Semi-Pelagianism because justification is based upon our performance, which leads to a lack of assurance and a denial of grace. See Waters, Justification and the New Perspectives on Paul, 171; 174; Cf. Michael Bird, who critiques a similar viewpoint in E.P. Sanders, arguing that the notion of getting in the covenant by grace but staying in by works is a merit-theology. See Bird, Saving Righteousness of God, 91; 95.
turn away from Christ and in upon themselves to examine whether they are bearing enough fruit to be accepted by God.

Michael Bird perceives the essential problem of this perspective to be that ‘it shifts the material cause of eschatological justification from Christology to pneumatology’. Bird contends that salvation must be understood in Christocentric terms; the works of obedience that God requires were accomplished by Christ’s faithfulness and the final judgement was accomplished in his death. This means that justification is not a two-stage event where the final end can be in doubt. All those who place their faith in Christ have assurance of salvation because ‘the verdict awaited at the final judgment has been declared in advance’.

This is the merit of the Torrances’ objective, Christocentric scheme of salvation: assurance of salvation and freedom from having to earn it ourselves. T.F. asserts, ‘In God there is no Yes and No, but only Yes. It is upon the Yes of God’s eternal love for us that our salvation rests...’. He points out that the New Testament word ‘parousia’ is singular, indicating the continuity between Christ’s first and second coming. Since our judgement is complete in Christ and we are fully accepted by God, the last judgement is an unveiling of this permanently positive verdict:

He will come again in the fullness of his humanity and deity to judge and renew his creation, but that will not be another work in addition to his finished work on the Cross or in the resurrection, so much as the gathering together of what the cross and resurrection have already worked throughout the whole of creation and the unveiling of it for all to see, and therefore an unfolding and actualization of it from our point of view.

Indicative and Imperative

If our works by the Spirit are not a necessary condition for final justification, since the last judgement is an unveiling of God’s unconditionally positive verdict, the question remains as

---

86 Ibid., 174-75.
87 T.F.T., Christian Doctrine, 246. A difficulty with federal theology’s doctrine of limited atonement is that it separates the cross from final judgement, and Christ from the Father, leading to the belief that there is still an unknown judgement to be poured out at the eschaton. See T.F.T., Atonement, 185.
89 Ibid., 152.
to the place of our works by the Spirit. For the Torrances, our works by the Spirit are a response to God’s grace, rather than a means to earn it.

J.B. often asserts that ‘the indicatives of grace are always prior to the obligations of law and human obedience’. This is made clear in God’s giving of the Ten Commandments, which are preceded by a statement of His covenantal faithfulness and grace: “I am the Lord your God, who brought you out of Egypt, out of the land of slavery” (Ex. 20:2). J.B. considers that it is on this basis that the law is given; ‘...therefore keep my commandments’. Our works by the Spirit are in joyful, obedient response to God’s unconditional grace. Similarly, John Piper argues that our works stem from our assurance of God’s grace, rather than the aspiration to secure it:

There would be a double tragedy in thinking of our works of love as securing the fact that God is completely for us. Not only would we obscure the very reason these works exist – namely, to display the beauty and worth of Christ, whose blood and righteousness is the only and all-sufficient guarantee that God is for us- but we would also undermine the very thing that makes the works of love possible- namely, the assurance that God is totally for us, from which flows the freedom and courage to make the sacrifices of love.

Moreover, for the Torrances, this response by the Spirit to God’s unconditional grace cannot be understood in abstraction from Jesus’ vicarious response on our behalf. Our response by the Spirit is a participation in Christ’s perfect obedience. Our works by the Spirit cannot be understood according to logico-causal categories whereby our works earn a final justification. Our works by the Spirit are the fruit of participating in Christ. As Dane Ortlund argues, ‘Justification and judgment are linked not so much in cause-and-effect or linear progression as they are organically unified... Justification and obedience both sprout from the seed of union with Christ... Those who are justified will, for reasons other than any kind of earning, do the law.’ Similarly, Bird asserts, ‘Justification is not the result of the empowerment of the Spirit in the life of the believer... Ultimately, obedience and

---

91 Ibid.
93 John Piper, The Future of Justification, 186.
95 Ortlund, ‘Justified by Faith’, 338.
faithfulness are functions of believing in Christ and flow from the work of Christ operating in the believer through the Spirit.\(^9^6\)

Therefore, rather than being turned in upon ourselves, worrying about whether we are bearing enough fruit for final justification, we should fix our eyes upon Jesus. He has lived a life of perfect obedience in our place, taking full judgement upon himself and securing our acceptance, so that as we participate in him in freedom and joy, we might bear the fruit of the Spirit. J.B. writes, ‘As we look to him in faith, we know that the righteous requirements (dikaiomata) of the law and the ordinances of worship have not only been fulfilled for us by Christ, but are fulfilled in us as we live in the Spirit (Rom. 8:1-4).\(^9^7\)

Conclusion

A greater appreciation of the Holy Spirit is perceived to be the answer not only by those who have wished to see a greater emphasis on our human response of faith, but also by those who wish to see a greater emphasis on our human works. For proponents of the New Perspective on Paul, the Holy Spirit has an essential role in inspiring us to good works in order to be justified at the final judgement. Yet the difficulty with a final justification dependent upon our works, regardless of empowerment by the Spirit, is that it posits a last judgement which is uncertain and thus turns us inwards upon ourselves to examine our works for assurance of salvation. Essentially, it disregards the total judgement already made in Christ.

In upholding an objective, Christocentric view of judgement, the Torrances certainly do diminish the significance of our human works by the Spirit at the last judgement, yet they ultimately put them in their proper place. According to the Torrances’ scheme of salvation, Christ lived a vicarious life of perfect obedience by the Spirit, submitting to God’s judgement upon sin, which means that a positive verdict has been made upon humanity. This gives us assurance of salvation and freedom from having to earn it ourselves. The last judgement will be a full unveiling of this irrevocable decision. Although the Torrances do diminish works by the Spirit understood according to merit-based, logico-causal categories, they uphold the significance of our works by the Spirit when conceived of as the fruit of participating in God’s objective act of grace in Christ.

Knowledge and Experience

Spirit of Truth

The Torrances’ objective, Christocentric view of salvation raises questions as to the significance for humanity of knowledge of God, relationship with God and experience of God. Since our salvation is a finished work in Christ, our knowledge of this objective reality has an essential place in the Torrances’ scheme of salvation. T.F. describes humanity’s reception of salvation in terms of a ‘realisation’ that it has already been accomplished for us in Christ:

Our adoption, sanctification and regeneration have already taken place in Christ, and are fully enclosed in his birth, holy life, death and resurrection undertaken for our sakes, and proceed from them more by way of realisation or actualisation in us of what has already happened to us in him than as new effect resulting from them. 98

Knowledge of God certainly holds an essential place in the Biblical witness. Paul often prays that the early Christians would come to a deeper knowledge of God’s truth (Eph. 1:18-20; 3:14-19; Phil. 1:9-10; Col. 1:9-10). Paul urges the Romans to ‘be transformed by the renewing of your mind’ (Rom. 12:2). The Greek word for ‘repentance’, metanoia, which has come to be understood in terms of acts of confession and penance, is better translated as ‘a change of mind’. This indicates the significance of what we believe for the actualisation of salvation in us.

However, the importance of knowledge of God in the Torrances’ scheme of salvation raises the questions as to whether this makes salvation dependent upon intellectual capacity or correct theological knowledge. These questions are significant because this would suggest that some are unfairly excluded from salvation on these grounds. 99 However, the Torrances are not susceptible to this critique because they affirm that our ‘realisation’ is not dependent upon our own intellectual capacity or knowledge of the truth, but upon the 99 This is the difficulty with the notion of ‘salvation by existential decision’, which the Torrance brothers critiqued, as discussed in chapter two. For further criticism in this regard, see Campbell, Deliverance of God.

98 T.F.T., Reconciliation, 89.
The Holy Spirit is ‘the Spirit of truth’ (John 14:7; 16:13), who reveals the reality of our salvation in Christ. T.F. writes,

The mission of the Spirit sent from the Father in the name of the Son as the Spirit of truth is to convict people of the truth as it is in Jesus, in judgement and mercy, to enlighten, inform and strengthen the Church through serving the centrality of Christ and deepening its understanding of his teaching and person as the incarnate Son of the Father, the one Lord and Saviour of humanity.

Thus, for the Torrances, our reception of the objective reality of salvation is also a thoroughly objective event because it is a work of the Holy Spirit.

Spirit of Adoption

If we receive salvation by realising that we have already been redeemed, this raises the question of whether the Torrances reduce salvation to a noetic concept. As Kye Won Lee considers, ‘What is at stake, for [T.F.] Torrance, is the reduction of the soteriological fact or reality into the realm of our cognition, even though he argues for pneumatological epistemology in which this cognition is given as the gift by the Holy Spirit.’ Bevan considers what this means for human faith, which may be understood ‘too narrowly as an 100 Furthermore, the Torrances’ objective scheme of salvation is radically inclusive because all of humanity is unconditionally included in God’s filial purposes. As T.F. wrote, ‘Those outside the Church are to be regarded in the sphere where this reconciliation has not yet been subjectively actualized but is nevertheless objectively accomplished for them in Jesus Christ.’ (T.F.T., School of Faith, cxvii). On the other hand, a federal view whereby God is related to only some of humanity as Father runs a high risk of not extending grace to those who do not share the same theology (on the belief that God Himself may not have intended them for salvation). Nevertheless, there is still the danger, despite holding the Torrances’ theology of inclusive grace, of having an ungracious attitude towards others who have not yet benefitted from this revelation. Although a person’s legalistic thinking may be wrong, the one who has come to a better understanding of God must demonstrate grace and patience. A lack of grace can arise from having a knowledge of grace without a more intimate relationship with the giver of Grace. Thus it is of utmost importance that the Spirit is not only the Spirit of truth but also the Spirit of adoption.

---

intellectual act’.

Habets has also perceived that T.F. is subject to the criticism that epistemology essentially defines what it means to be saved.

The theology of the Torrances does not reduce salvation to a noetic concept. The anhypostatic movement of the Spirit revealing the truth of God to humanity is accompanied by the enhypostatic movement of the Spirit raising humanity up to participate in the Triune life. As J.B. writes, ‘There is a God-humanward movement of the Spirit, in creating, in revealing... But there is also a human-Godward ministry of the Spirit of leading us to the Father through Christ... lifting us up into communion with God, into the very life of the Triune God.’ The Spirit, J.B. argues, must not be conceived of as a mere impersonal, instrumental cause; the Spirit is the bond of union between the Father and the Spirit who draws humanity up to share in their communion.

The Holy Spirit is not only the Spirit of truth but ‘the Spirit of adoption’ (Rom. 8:15). By the Spirit, humanity is enabled to cry “Abba, Father”, sharing in Jesus’ relationship with the Father. Habets argues, ‘For [T.F.] Torrance, “knowing” is a participatory knowledge in which one indwells the subject, hence for Torrance “knowing” moves well beyond the merely noetic...’ Trevor Hart writes of this as a ‘personal knowing’, the difference between ‘knowing’ God or just ‘knowing about’ God. Thus salvation is not reduced to a noetic concept; the Torrances’ articulation of the enhypostatic movement whereby humanity is drawn by the Spirit into the Triune life is profoundly personal and relational.

Nevertheless, it does seem that whilst the Torrances were of one mind theologically, they had different emphases personally and practically. Whilst they both affirmed that the Spirit brings humanity knowledge of God and draws us up to participate in the Triune life, there can be seen in T.F. an emphasis on the noetic aspect of salvation, whilst in J.B. an emphasis on the relational aspect.

---

105 Myk Habets, ‘“There is no God behind the back of Jesus Christ” Christologically Conditioned Election’ in Myk Habets and Bobby Grow eds. Evangelical Calvinism: Essays Resourcing the Continuing Reformation of the Church (Eugene: Pickwick, 2012), 190.
106 J.B.T., ‘Christ in our place’, 51.
108 T.F.T., Christian Doctrine, 154; Trinitarian Faith, 231.
109 Habets, ‘“There is no God behind the back of Jesus Christ”, 190; Cf. Habets, ‘The Doctrine of Election’, 348.
T.F. spent much of his time reading and writing in his study and he published prolifically. Appreciative testimonies of T.F. point to his noetic concern for the truth of the gospel as expressed in preaching and teaching. His brother, D.W., considers that T.F. described himself primarily as ‘a preacher of the gospel’ and reflects, ‘He was passionately concerned that ministers should understand the Word of God and be faithful in proclaiming and teaching it.’\textsuperscript{111} Habets writes, ‘Perhaps the greatest accolade one might pay [T.F.] Torrance, and one that he himself would certainly welcome, is that he was at heart a Christian, a figure who was utterly persuaded by the truth of the gospel and who sought to persuade others of that same truth.’\textsuperscript{112}

J.B., on the other hand, published comparatively little but devoted much of his time to his students. His former student, Heron, reflects that he was an academic teacher who engaged both his mind and his heart, ‘a man of faith whose goal and interest was above all the nurturing and guiding of others in the way of that same faith.’\textsuperscript{113} The thrust of J.B.’s academic work was to correct an impersonal, contractual view of God, showing that He is a covenantal God with primarily filial purposes for humanity. He often wrote of how humanity in Christ is ‘drawn by the Spirit into communion with the Father’.\textsuperscript{114} He was concerned to affirm this enhypostatic movement which he perceived to have been so neglected in Presbyterianism:

We need a recovery of the doctrine of the Priestly ministry of the Spirit. Christ as the One Mediator alone represents God to man and man to God. The Spirit as the Spirit of Christ is speaking Spirit and interceding Spirit (Romans ch. 8). As speaking Spirit He mediates God’s Word to men... As interceding Spirit, He lifts us up into heavenly places in Christ. He puts the prayer of Jesus into our lips – ‘Abba, Father’... Perhaps in Presbyterianism we have emphasised speaking Spirit at the expense of the interceding Spirit.\textsuperscript{115}

\textsuperscript{111} D.W.T., Interview by Todd Speidell in \textit{Participatio} Supplement to Volume 1 (2011), 25.
\textsuperscript{113} Heron, ‘James Torrance: An Appreciation’, 2.
\textsuperscript{114} J.B.T., \textit{Worship}, 55.
\textsuperscript{115} J.B.T., ‘Covenant or contract?’, 75-76. J.B. is writing here specifically about worship but it has wider implications. This Presbyterian emphasis on ‘speaking Spirit’ perhaps explains T.F.’s noetic accent.
If salvation is an objective reality in Christ which we can realise and share in by the Spirit of truth and adoption, this leads to the question of our personal experience of this union and communion. The Torrances’ account of being drawn by the Spirit into the triune life is personal and relational, which suggests that intimate experience of God follows as a logical consequence. The Torrances write of the joy and peace produced by this communion but experience of God is not discussed much further than that.

Habets considers, ‘It can be argued that [T.F.] Torrance tends to undermine his commitment to a theology of union and communion between God and humanity, emphasizing cognitive union to the relative neglect of mystical and spiritual union.’ T.F. is critical of mysticism, which he understands in the sense of ‘intuitive knowledge’ or ‘non-logical knowing that arises under the constraint of reality upon the mind’. However, Habets argues that T.F.’s criticism of mysticism is based upon an unfair assessment of mysticism as a whole. He proposes that T.F.’s theology is actually harmonious with the essential nature of mysticism, which concerns the experience of intimacy with God. Furthermore, whilst the essence of mysticism is experiential, it depends upon knowledge. Mysticism and theology are bound up with one another, as can be seen in the example of St Athanasius. Considering that St Athanasius is a seminal figure for T.F., Habets finds his complete denunciation of mysticism surprising. Habets argues,

By rejecting mysticism tout court, Torrance’s articulation of the Christian life, theology, and spirituality is weakened if not obfuscated. It is apparent that Torrance has adopted an inaccurate definition of mysticism, which leads him to

---

117 Habets, ‘T.F. Torrance: Mystical Theologian’, 102. According to Heiko Oberman, mysticism has been misunderstood by Protestants. See Heiko Oberman, The Reformation: Roots and Ramifications (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1994), 80. Julie Canlis observes that Calvin’s background of the medieval and mystical theological tradition is more recently being appreciated. She argues that Calvin’s mysticism was rooted in Christ and his ascent, which defies notions of spiritual stages. See Julie Canlis, Calvin’s Ladder: A Spiritual Theology of Ascent and Ascension (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2010), 46-48.
120 Ibid., 102. T.F.’s suspicion of mysticism may have perhaps been influenced by his teacher, H.R. Mackintosh. Cf. Mackintosh, Divine Initiative, 110-111.
an a priori exclusion of mystical elements within his own theology at precisely the points at which it should be evident.\(^{121}\)

The Torrances’ theology would be complemented by consideration of the mystical and experiential aspects of the Christian life, as seen in the Eastern Orthodox Church and the Pentecostal-Charismatic movement.\(^{122}\) Whilst in form these two traditions are extremely different, both embrace intimate experience of God and charismata, in contrast to the typical Western Protestant tradition.\(^{123}\) ‘Curious by evangelical Christian standards’, Edmund Rybarczyk observes, ‘neither the Orthodox nor the Pentecostals have traditionally been concerned about rebutting any attacks on their respective experiential characters.’\(^{124}\) He considers, ‘Both emphasize that the human person was created for a transforming fellowship with God.’\(^{125}\)

The personal, intimate encounters with God that are experienced by the Pentecostal-Charismatic movement could be seen to be the logical consequence of being drawn by the Spirit into the Triune life.\(^{126}\) J.B. was less reserved about the Pentecostal-Charismatic movement than T.F., although J.B. never wrote about it whereas T.F. was openly critical.\(^{127}\) Their younger brother, D.W.T., is of one mind with them theologically yet finds it consistent to be an active proponent of the Pentecostal-Charismatic movement. Thomas Smail is also an example of someone who affirms both the Torrances’ theology and the experiences of the Pentecostal-Charismatic movement. Whilst Smail’s Barthian and Torrancian schooling had made him suspicious of mystical experience, he was personally impacted by new experiences of God at the dawn of the Pentecostal-Charismatic movement.

---

\(^{121}\) Ibid.

\(^{125}\) Rybarczyk, Beyond Salvation, 350. This has been hindered by Western external, legal concepts of atonement that cannot truly transform humanity.

\(^{126}\) Jim Purves argues that T.F. fails to see merit in the Pentecostal-Charismatic movement because his pneumatology is controlled and subsumed by Christology. See Jim Purves, The Triune God and the Charismatic Movement: A Critical Appraisal from a Scottish Perspective (Carlisle: Paternoster, 2004), 203.

in Britain. Smail came to believe that his experience of God complemented his theological belief: ‘What the Holy Spirit was doing was to take what I had always affirmed of Jesus and make some of it actually happen in me, so that at least to some degree my experience of God began to reflect his, the way a mirror reflects the object at which it is directed.’ Smail came to believe that an intellectual faith without intimate experience of God is insufficient. Thus consideration of the mystical and experiential aspects of the Christian life would complement the Torrances’ theology.

Conclusion

Knowledge of God holds an essential place in the Torrances’ scheme of salvation. Since salvation is a finished accomplishment in Christ, all that remains for humanity to enjoy it is to realise this objective reality. The Holy Spirit is ‘the Spirit of truth’ who reveals the reality of our salvation in Christ. This objective activity precludes any suggestion that salvation is dependent upon our own intellectual capacity or correct theological knowledge.

T.F. does place an emphasis on the noetic aspect of salvation, yet salvation is not reduced to epistemology in the theology of the Torrances. The anhypostatic movement of the Spirit revealing the truth of God to humanity is accompanied by the enhypostatic movement of the Spirit raising humanity up to participate in the Triune life. The Holy Spirit is ‘the Spirit of adoption’, by whom we participate in Jesus’ relationship with the Father.

---

130 He wrote, ‘But a truth that is only intellectual and objective... does not have the power and the means to effect that which it longs for... A gospel that remains in the realm of intellectual orthodoxy.... cannot by fail to grasp the dynamism of the Spirit to come and by his mighty acts realise the kingdom again among us.’ See Smail, Reflected Glory, 101-2. Cf. Smail: ‘The theological enterprise that mattered so much to me, and still does, is secondary to that, because how can you know what to say about God if you do not know the God of whom you are speaking? And how can you serve him and his kingdom if you are not in touch with the king you claim to be serving and lack the spiritual energy to fulfil his purposes, once you have discovered them?’ See Smail, ‘A Renewal Recalled’, 15. Cf. Pinnock, who perceives merit in the Pentecostal-Charismatic movement for its expectancy that salvation is relational and affective, bringing humanity into intimate relationship with God. See Pinnock, Flame of Love, 149; 171. He argues that personal experience of God is a necessary corollary to knowledge of God: ‘We must know God experientially, not just cognitively. We need to be empowered for mission, freed from fear, able to speak, full of praises. We need a breakthrough in the realm of the Spirit, an awakening to the presence and power of God. There may need to be a release of the Spirit, a flowering of grace in experience, an openness to the full range of the gifts’ (170). In fact, the vulnerability inherent in Pentecostal-Charismatic experience may even be an antidote to the danger of intellectual snobbery.
This personal, relational and participatory scheme of salvation indicates a God whom humanity can not only know but experience intimately. The Torrances write of fruits of the Spirit such as joy and peace but experience of God is not discussed much further. Their account of being drawn by the Spirit into the triune life would be complemented by consideration of the mystical and experiential aspects of the Christian life, as seen in the Eastern Orthodox Church and the Pentecostal-Charismatic movement.

Theosis

In the Spirit, Through the Son, To the Father

In the Torrances’ personal, relational and participatory scheme of salvation, the descent of the Spirit is in order to lift humanity up to God. T.F. argues that both sides of the Patristic formulation of the movement of the Spirit must be upheld: ‘From the Father, through the Son, in the Spirit and in the Spirit, through the Son, to the Father’. The Spirit draws us up as adopted sons of God to participate in Christ’s relationship with the Father.

From this basis, T.F. is critical of the Pentecostal-Charismatic Movement for a preoccupation with experiences of the Spirit at the expense of the Spirit’s enhypostatic movement which leads us to relationship with the Father through the Son:

The Holy Spirit is sent to us in the name of the Son not in order to concentrate our attention upon our own experiences, either inwardly or outwardly, but to lift up our vision and enable it to embrace a transcendent reality that extends infinitely above and beyond us... A deeper recognition of this all-important movement of the Spirit through the Son to the Father could do much for the Pentecostalists, for it would help them to direct the focus of their attention away from the phenomena that so often fascinate and absorb them to the mystery of God himself.

---

133 T.F.T., Reconciliation, 292. Moreover, T.F. was suspicious of charismatic experiences themselves, concerned about ‘the open and uncircumscribed character of these forms which extend beyond normal and controlled experience which constitutes their potential danger, for they are open to all kinds of extraneous forces and aims which may invade and pervert them’ (290). However, he did not
This same criticism is made by Smail, whilst also upholding the importance of Charismatic experience. Smail strongly supports the necessity of the Spirit making real in our experience what is promised in Christ. Yet he too recognises the problem of ‘a narrow pursuit of charismatic experiences and manifestations’ and argues that there needs to be a ‘discovery of Abba Father’. He points to the Spirit’s role in the New Testament as inspiring within humanity the declarations of “Abba Father” (Rom. 8:15; Gal. 4:6) and “Jesus is Lord” (1 Cor. 12:3). Smail argues, ‘The work of the Spirit is defined by the fact that in it the Father calls us into a sharing of life with himself and his Son (1 John 1.3).’

But it is the business of the Holy Spirit to take the things of Jesus and open them up to us, so that we in our way become participant in them. That is the basis of all the particular charismata, the gifts of grace. And it is also the basis of this central gift of grace, that the Spirit opens up to us the holy of holies and bids us enter, and become sharers in Jesus’ relationship to the Father.

D.W.T., reflecting on the early days of the Charismatic Movement, perceives a preoccupation with experience over against the intimacy of relationship with the triune God. He remembers being in a meeting of Charismatics who were asked to share what the new experiences of the Spirit essentially meant to them. D.W.T. was disappointed that the majority of answers focused on experiential feelings, such as joy and peace, because he believed that the Holy Spirit essentially leads us to participate more fully in Christ. This is still a problem within the Pentecostal-Charismatic Movement today. However, there are also Pentecostal-Charismatics who are discovering more fully what it means to participate by the Spirit in Jesus’ relationship with the Father.

discuss this much further. Deddo observes that T.F. made ‘suggestive comments’ to the Pentecostal-Charismatic Movement but most of his dialogue partners were dead church fathers, and so Deddo has expressed that he wished that T.F. had engaged more with modern issues raised by the Pentecostal-Charismatic Movement. See Deddo, ‘The Holy Spirit’, 107-8.

Smail, Reflected Glory, 34.

Smail, Forgotten Father, 45. This is the essential thesis of and reason for his book.

Ibid., 13; 30.

Ibid., 98.

Ibid., 42.

D.W.T. in personal conversation. Cf. ‘All three of us [brothers] agreed with Rev. Tom Smail, a theological leader in the charismatic movement and a friend of ours, that the Holy Spirit makes us more aware of Jesus Christ and leads us to participate more fully in Christ’s death and resurrection.’ D.W.T., Participatio, 25.

For example, John Crowder, Sons of Thunder; David Vaughan and Joanne Gravell, The New Ecstatics.
Whilst charismatic and mystical experience is an indispensable aspect of a personal, relational and participatory scheme of salvation, it is possible to misunderstand experiential manifestations as an end in themselves. Jesus declared that people would do miracles in his name yet not truly know him (Matt. 7:22-23). However, the ultimate end of God’s saving purposes is seen in the Torrances’ account of the enhypostatic movement of the Spirit, whereby humanity is drawn up to participate in Christ’s intimate relationship with the Father:

By his very nature the Holy Spirit not only proceeds from the Father but lifts up to the Father; he is not only the Spirit sent by Christ but the Spirit of response to Christ, the Spirit in whom and by whom and with whom we worship and glorify the Father and the Son. Not only is he God descending to us, the Spirit by whom God bears witness to himself, but God the Holy Spirit lifting up all creation in praise and rejoicing in God, himself the Spirit of worship and witness by whom the Church lives and fulfils its mission to the glory of God.\(^{142}\)

Theosis

The Torrances’ personal, relational and participatory scheme of salvation whereby humanity’s ultimate end is to be drawn by the Spirit in Christ to share in the triune life is closer to Eastern Orthodox theology than the typical Western Protestant external, legal doctrine of justification. It has been proposed that T.F.’s soteriology is best encapsulated by the doctrine of theosis.\(^{143}\) T.F. urged the Reformed tradition in his time to be more receptive to this Eastern Orthodox doctrine.\(^{144}\)

However, the notion of participation in the divine is considered by many not to be a Reformed category.\(^{145}\) Theosis is suspected of wrongly confusing humanity with God.\(^{146}\) A

---

\(^{143}\) Hart, ‘Atonement, the Incarnation, and Deification’, 90. Habets has written a whole monograph on T.F.’s doctrine of theosis. See Habets, Theosis.
\(^{145}\) Canlis, Calvin’s Ladder, 13. Canlis gives the example of John Webster, Holiness (London: SCM Press, 2003), 62. However, the translation of Eastern Orthodox texts along with re-readings of Luther and Calvin which identify participatory modes of thought are attributed to drawing greater attention to theosis in the West. See Habets, ‘Reforming Theosis’, 151.
\(^{146}\) Habets, Theosis, 196. For example, John Webster considers that Eberhard Jüngel rejects the notion of human participation in the divine because he perceives it to compromise our humanity. See John Webster, ‘Introduction’ in Eberhard Jüngel, Justification: The Heart of the Christian Faith (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 2001). However, although it is indeed wrong to confuse humanity with God, the offense taken at the notion of such an intimate relationship with the divine may be symptomatic of the wider classic statement of theosis is Athanasius’ dictum, ‘[God] became man that man might become god.’ However, T.F. understands theosis in terms of communion with God rather than a change in our being, appreciatively citing Georges Florovsky:

> The term theosis is indeed embarrassing, if we would think of it in ‘ontological categories’. Indeed, man simply cannot become ‘god’. But the Fathers were thinking in ‘personal’, terms, and the mystery of personal communion was involved at this point. Theosis means a personal encounter. It is the ultimate intercourse with God, in which the whole of human existence is, as it were, permeated by the Divine Presence.

T.F. writes, ‘...we are adopted and made sons of God in [Christ], and in that respect, as those who through union with Christ receive the grace and light of his Spirit, are said to be theoi (in Greek).’

His understanding of theosis is Christocentric, rooted in the mediation of Christ:

> In the ascension of the Son of Man, New Man in Christ is given to partake of divine nature. There we reach the goal of the incarnation, in our great Prodomos or Forerunner at the right hand of God. We are with Jesus beside God, for we are gathered up in him and included in his own self-presentation before the Father.

T.F. is aware of ‘the danger of vertigo’ and is very careful to make clear that theosis does not mean that humanity becomes God. Although humanity is united to Christ and shares in the divine life, we retain our creatureliness, just as Jesus' humanity is not deified by its union with his divine nature:

> The hypostatic union of the divine and human natures in Jesus preserves the human and creaturely being he took from us, and it is in and through our sharing in that human and creaturely being, sanctified and blessed with him, that we share in the life of God while remaining what we are made to be, humans and not Gods.

---

147 Athanasius, De incarnatione, 54:3.
151 Ibid., 136. T.F. was critical of this danger of vertigo in mysticism.
T.F. also does not adopt the doctrine of theosis unquestioningly, rejecting the Palamite distinction between God’s essence and energies, and preferring not to use the language of ‘deification’ for the reason that it does not adequately reflect the Creator-creature distinction.\(^{152}\)

Habets argues that whilst T.F. does not provide a comprehensive doctrine of theosis, he nevertheless lays a good foundation, articulating how humanity remains as creatures yet communes with God, on account of being united to Christ by the Spirit.\(^{153}\)

Like Christ

Whilst it is necessary to maintain the distinction between God and humanity, Smail argues that to deny the similarity would be to dishonour God and His grace and to make Him irrelevant.\(^{154}\) As sons of God, we should have the confidence to enjoy our inheritance.\(^{155}\) Smail perceives merit in the Charismatic movement for appreciating that we have been made ‘fellow heirs with Christ’, ‘the New Adam, the ultimate man, whose new humanity spills over in the Holy Spirit to us so that we become new men and signs of the new creation’.\(^{156}\)

Theosis is defined as a transformative concept by Michael Gorman: ‘Theosis is transformative participation in the kenotic, cruciform character of God through Spirit-enabled conformity to the incarnate, crucified, and resurrected/glorified Christ.’\(^{157}\) Paul exhorts the Corinthians to follow his example, as he follows the example of Christ (1 Cor. 11:1). Conformity to Christ, Gorman points out, is an essential aspect of theosis.\(^{158}\)

In writing of Christ’s atoning exchange, T.F. quotes Gregory Nazianzen:

> Let us become like Christ, since Christ became like us. Let us become divine for his sake, since he for ours became man. He assumed the worst that he might give us the better; he became poor that we through his poverty might be rich; he \(^{153}\) Habets, ‘Reforming Theosis’, 152; 157.

---

\(^{154}\) Smail, Forgotten Father, 133-34.

\(^{155}\) Ibid., 129.

\(^{156}\) Ibid., 138. Although at the same time Smail was cautious of an over-realised eschatology (142).

\(^{158}\) Ibid., 23.
took upon himself the form of a servant that we might receive back our liberty; he came down that we might be exalted; he was tempted that we might conquer; he was dishonoured that he might glorify us; he ascended that he might draw us to himself, who were lying low in the fall of sin. Let us give all, offer all, to him who gave himself a ransom and reconciliation for us.

However, the emphasis of T.F.‘s theology is upon Christ taking our humanity and it would be complemented by a greater appreciation of that which humanity has received and is called to on account of this atoning exchange. The two must be held together for Christ’s vicarious humanity is the indispensable foundation which prevents our likeness to Christ from becoming a burden which we must achieve ourselves. This is expressed well by J.B. when he calls for humanity to become by the Holy Spirit who we already are in Christ:

The Kingdom of God as God’s will for man has been realized for us intensively in the humanity of Jesus, and what has been realized intensively for us in Christ must be worked out extensively in us in the world, by the Holy Spirit, through the mission of the Church. Through the preaching of the Gospel we are called to become now in ourselves what we already are in Christ.

Therefore, whilst it is imperative to make a proper distinction between God and humanity, it is also important to take proper account of the likeness which God calls us to through participating in Christ by the Holy Spirit.

Conclusion

Theosis is the ultimate end of the Torrances’ personal, relational and participatory scheme of salvation. Whilst charismatic and mystical experience is an indispensable aspect, it is not an end in itself. It serves God’s greater filial purpose of drawing us up by the Spirit to participate in Christ’s intimate relationship with the Father. In so doing, humanity does not lose its humanness, but we are transformed to become more like Christ. The Torrances’ theology would be complemented by a greater appreciation of what humanity has received and is called to in Christ.

---

Conclusion

The Torrances’ soteriology presents a Father with covenantal and filial purposes who elects all of humanity in his Son; a Son who intimately assumes our humanity in order to transform it ontologically in himself by the Spirit; and a Holy Spirit who draws us as adopted sons and daughters to participate in Jesus’ relationship with the Father and to share in the triune life of love.

This radically objective, Christocentric scheme of salvation has been criticised for focusing on Christ at the expense of the Spirit. However, as the God-man, Christ is the appropriate axis of theology and this serves to uphold rather than diminish the role of the Holy Spirit. There is a mutual mediation of Christ and the Spirit: Christ mediates the Holy Spirit to humanity by vicariously receiving the Spirit and pouring Him out; the Holy Spirit mediates Christ because it was by the Spirit that Christ was incarnated and lived a vicarious life, and it is by the Spirit that humanity is united to Christ and lifted up to share in the Triune life. The Spirit is therefore integral to every aspect of salvation. A more detailed exposition of the Spirit’s action upon Jesus’ humanity would aid a better understanding of the Spirit’s action upon us today. However, there is an inherent mystery to pneumatology for the nature of the Holy Spirit is to point away from Himself to Christ and the Father.

The objectivity of the Torrances’ soteriology has been considered to diminish the significance of both the Spirit and our human response. The objective union of Christ with humanity is thought to negate its subjective actualisation in us by the Spirit. However, whilst the believer’s activity of faith by the Spirit is imperative, it is only made possible on account of the prior ontological union in Christ. This radical objectivity is essential for our ontological transformation and to avoid being thrown back upon ourselves. There is also the further issue that Christ’s perfect response on our behalf is thought to negate our own human response by the Spirit. However, the Spirit does not enable us to make our own logico-causal, autonomous response to Christ, which would only throw us back upon ourselves again, but to participate in Christ’s response for us. This participatory scheme comes to tangible expression in the sacraments of baptism and the Eucharist and, rather than devaluing our humanity, truly establishes it.

The objectivity of the Torrances’ soteriology has also been considered to diminish the significance of our human works by the Spirit for final judgement. However, a final judgement dependent upon works, despite empowerment by the Spirit, makes the last judgement uncertain and turns humanity in upon itself in search of assurance of salvation. An objective, Christocentric view of judgement is essential to provide assurance of salvation and freedom from having to earn it ourselves. Christ’s vicarious life of perfect obedience by the Spirit, whereby he submits to God’s judgement upon sin, means that an irreversibly positive verdict has been made upon humanity. Whilst this diminishes the significance of logico-causal, merit-based human works, it upholds the significance of works by the Spirit which are the fruit of freely participating in God’s objective act of grace in Christ.

Such an objective scheme of redemption can appear to reduce salvation to a noetic concept. Since salvation has been decisively achieved in Christ, all that remains for humanity to enjoy it is to realise this objective reality. The Holy Spirit is ‘the Spirit of truth’ who reveals the reality of our salvation in Christ. This objective activity is important in disallowing any notion that salvation is dependent upon our own intellectual capacity or correct theological knowledge. However, the Holy Spirit is also ‘the Spirit of adoption’, by whom we participate in Jesus’ relationship with the Father. Salvation is not reduced to epistemology because the anhypostatic movement of the Spirit revealing the truth of God to humanity is accompanied by the enhypostatic movement of the Spirit raising humanity up to participate in the triune life. This is a profoundly personal, relational and participatory scheme of salvation that indicates a God whom humanity can not only know but experience intimately. A greater openness to and consideration of the mystical and experiential aspects of the Christian life would therefore complement this scheme of salvation. However, mystical experience is not an end in itself but serves God’s greater filial purpose of drawing us up by the Spirit to enjoy Christ’s intimate relationship with the Father. In so doing, we do not lose our humanity, but are transformed to become more like Christ.

Theosis is the ultimate end of the Torrances’ personal, relational and participatory scheme of salvation, yet so much more can be explored in this regard. Habets considers,

...because [T.F.] Torrance emphasises the objective elements of salvation his articulation of the subjective elements remain largely undeveloped. Thus his theology promises more than it delivers as it contains little by way of clearly articulated practical application. This is not to imply that his theology is impractical... but rather, that he has not elaborated on many of these points in detail.\(^{161}\)

\(^{161}\) Habets, Theosis, 152.
Part Two of this thesis will go on to discover more deeply the subjective implications of the Torrances’ scheme of salvation with specific regard to becoming like Christ in holiness, for justification is irreducibly bound up with sanctification.
Part Two:
Sanctification and Human Participation
Christ is our Holiness: Objective over Subjective

The purpose of Part Two of this thesis is to extend the liberating implications of the Torrances’ soteriology to the doctrine of sanctification. Part One explored the profoundly objective dynamics of the triune God of grace. The Father elects all of humanity in His Son, the Son becomes flesh to transform us ontologically in Himself by the Spirit, and the Spirit now draws us to participate as adopted sons and daughters in Jesus’ communion with the Father. The objectivity of this account enables us to freely enjoy the reality of our salvation, liberated from the burden of attempting to achieve it ourselves.

This chapter seeks to contend that humanity is not only set free from the burden of attempting to achieve salvation, but also from the burden of attempting to achieve sanctification. Whilst there is a lack of emphasis on the subjective nature of sanctification in the Torrances’ theology, the objectivity of their account of salvation offers a crucial foundation for a liberating understanding of sanctification.

This is an important contribution for, having been justified by faith, it is often supposed that it is the Christian’s task to work out his own sanctification. As Deddo considers,

What I have observed so often in the Christian Church is that whether conservative or liberal, traditional or contemporary, emergent or mega-church,
Christians basically live as if saved by grace but sanctified by works. We depend on our own efforts, choices, accomplishments or zeal. Grace is where we start the Christian life but often we somehow end up ‘thrown back upon our own resources’ and feeling under a great burden. Then we become first unimpressed, then perhaps depressed, and finally even coldly cynical about the whole Christian life itself.

This burden is created when sanctification is separated from its ground with justification in Christ and made a subsequent stage in the ordo salutis. Humanity is then thrown back upon its own resources to attempt to achieve sanctification. The Torrances affirm the liberating reality that sanctification is rooted definitively with justification in the vicarious humanity of Christ. The key to releasing humanity from a contractual conception of sanctification, considers Barth, is the vicarious humanity of Christ:

> It has not always been taken with sufficient seriousness that He took our place and acted for us, not merely as the Son of God who established God’s right and our own by allowing Himself, the Judge, to be judged for us, but also as the Son of Man who was sanctified, who sanctified Himself. Far too often the matter has been conceived and represented as though His humiliation to death for our justification by Him as our Representative were His own act, but our exaltation to fellowship with God as the corresponding counter-movement, and therefore our sanctification, were left to us, to be accomplished by us. “All this I did for thee; what wilt thou do for me?” The New Testament does not speak in this way.

The subjective outworking of sanctification can also become a burden when it is conceived of as an external, logico-causal response whereby the Christian must apply Christ’s benefits with the aid of the Spirit. In contrast, the Torrances present the outworking of sanctification in radically liberating terms of participating by the Spirit in Christ. The obligations of law are not only subsequent to, but a very participation in, the indicatives of grace. This is a drastic denial of any burdensome, moralistic endeavour and affirms the 1 Deddo, ‘The Christian Life’, 138-9; Cf. Smail: ‘We have been saved in the power of his blood, but have to live the Christian life out of our own resources of our own humanity, by pious dedication and consecration, or by organised religions, evangelistic or social activism – so that instead of the principle of grace covering the whole of our life, we behave as if we had been saved by grace, but have to live by our own works.’ Smail, Reflected Glory, 60-1; Cf. Herman Bavinck: ‘There are many Christians who... acknowledge that they are justified through the righteousness which Christ has accomplished, but they maintain or at least act as though they hold that they must be sanctified by a holiness that they must themselves achieve.’ Herman Bavinck, Our Reasonable Faith (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1956), 476.

---

proper place of our subjective outworking of sanctification, that is, as free and joyful participation by the Spirit in what God has already objectively accomplished in Christ.

The Absence of Emphasis on the Subjective Nature of Sanctification

The subjective nature of sanctification has not typically been a Protestant emphasis. Stanley Hauerwas suggests that this is because the Protestant condemnation of works-righteousness led to a focus on the objective work of God. Discussion of the subjective nature of sanctification has even tended towards having a negative association. Thomas Noble has observed that the notion of the possibility of living a holy life often provokes a negative reaction, particularly in the Reformed tradition, which he attributes to the historical Protestant reaction to the hypocrisy of claims to holiness amidst corruption in the church. However, Noble was a student of T.F. and reflects that, whilst it might be expected that a Reformed theologian would not be positive about the language of ‘perfection’, T.F. was remarkably encouraging of his interest. Noble attributes this to T.F.’s deep knowledge of the Fathers, in whom can be found a very positive discussion of sanctification.

Although T.F. was remarkably encouraging about the exploration of the subjective nature of sanctification, both he and J.B. are characteristic of their Reformed tradition in largely avoiding the subject. J.B. explores the subjective implications of salvation most notably with regard to worship, and T.F. with regard to faith, conversion, worship, the sacraments and evangelism. Yet there is little exploration of the liberating implications of sanctification as we participate by the Spirit in what has been decisively accomplished through the vicarious humanity of Christ.

---

3 The most notable exception within the tradition being John Wesley’s concept of ‘perfection in love’, although Thomas Noble regrets that this has been rejected by many Protestants on account of a misunderstanding of this as ‘sinless perfection’ due its distortion by later Wesleyans. T.A. Noble, Holy Trinity: Holy People: The Theology of Christian Perfecting (Eugene: Wipf and Stock, 2013), 3.

6 Ibid., xii. T.F. shows the influence of Athanasius and Cyril especially.

This lack of exploration could perhaps be attributable to their following the concern of their Reformed tradition to avoid works-righteousness. The Torrances were troubled by preaching and teaching that, to use T.F.’s phrase, ‘throws people back upon themselves’ to try and achieve their own salvation.\(^8\) J.B. perceives that this problem stemmed from a distorted conception of God relating to us in contractual terms. Therefore, he repeatedly insists, ‘The God of the Bible, the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ is a covenant-God, and not a contract-God.’\(^9\) One of T.F.’s particular concerns is that people are thrown back upon themselves by an external conception of the atonement. An external paradigm presents Christ merely as an example that we must follow rather than as our Head in whom humanity died and was resurrected. It cannot truly transform humanity and therefore demands our own impossible efforts. T.F. feels strongly that a merely exemplar Christ leaves humanity ‘in utter darkness and despair’.\(^10\) He champions the objective nature of the atonement through the vicarious humanity of Christ.

This is an important contribution but, in order to counteract the problem of people being thrown back upon themselves to works-righteousness, the necessity of following Christ as our example is minimised. Stanley Hauerwas argues that the dialectical tension between what God has done and our subjective human involvement must be kept in balance. In sympathy with the concern to uphold God’s objective activity, Hauerwas recognises that if the balance is tipped too far towards our subjective activity, sanctification is detached from the reality which upholds it. However, he argues that when the balance is tipped too far towards God’s objective work, this makes our human response insignificant.\(^11\) For this reason Hauerwas commends John Wesley in taking seriously the demand for the Christian’s transformation into the likeness of Christ.\(^12\) Whilst this demand carries with it the danger of being distorted into a works-righteousness, Hauerwas argues that the subjective nature of sanctification must not be overlooked because it is essential to the Christian life.\(^13\)

---

\(^8\) T.F.T., ‘Preaching Jesus Christ’, 28.
\(^11\) Hauerwas, Character and the Christian Life, 130. Hauerwas associates this problem with both Rudolph Bultmann and Karl Barth.
\(^12\) Stanley Hauerwas, Sanctify Them in the Truth: Holiness Exemplified (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1998), 124. Cf. ‘Wesley was content neither with legalism nor with antinomianism as a true account of the Christian life.’ Hauerwas, Character and the Christian Life, 198.
\(^13\) Ibid. Hauerwas explores this in terms of an ‘ethics of character’. Cf. Hauerwas, Character and the Christian Life, 129-130.
The Torrances certainly appreciate the obligations of grace. T.F. argues that the ‘logic of grace’ is that ‘all of grace’ does not mean nothing of man but rather ‘all of man’. Likewise, J.B. believes that although God makes the covenant for us, it demands a response from us. However, there is little exploration of the obligations of grace with regard to sanctification. Andrew Murray believes that the neglect of Christ as our example and of the imperative to live a holy life is symptomatic of Protestant Christianity as a whole:

The doctrine that Christ lived on earth, not only to die for our redemption, but to show us how we were to live, did not receive sufficient prominence. While no orthodox church will deny that Christ is our Example, the absolute necessity of following the example of His life is not preached with the same distinctness as that of trusting the atonement of His death... In this respect, the Protestant Churches still need to go on to perfection. Only then will the Church put on her beautiful garments, and truly shine in the light of God’s glory- when these two truths are held in that wondrous unity in which they appear in the life of Christ Himself.

Murray perceives that people are content with salvation’s pardon and feeling of peace but argues that God desires more than that; He desires conformity to his Son. Therefore, Christ as our substitute, on account of his vicarious humanity, must be affirmed together with Christ as our example, on account of the Biblical imperative to grow into our likeness to Christ.

---

15 J.B.T., ‘Covenant or Contract?’, 23; 55.
16 Andrew Murray, Like Christ (New Kensington: Whitaker House, 1983), 227-8; cf. Murray: ‘...the Church indeed needs a second reformation. In the great Reformation three centuries ago, the power of Christ’s atoning death and righteousness were brought to light – to the great comfort and joy of anxious souls. But, we need a second reformation to lift on high the banner of Christ’s example as our law, and to restore the truth of the power of Christ’s resurrection as it makes us partakers of the life and the likeness of our Lord. Christians must not only believe in the full union with their Surety for their reconciliation, but with their Head as their example and their life.’ Ibid., 62.
17 Ibid., 227. Murray asserts, ‘Christ lived on earth that He might show forth the image of God in His life. He lives in heaven that we may show forth the image of God in our lives.’ Ibid., 226. Cf., Murray: ‘He lives like us, so that we may live like Him.’ Andrew Murray, The Secret of God’s Presence (New Kensington: Whitaker House, 1982), 51. According to personal conversation with Alan Torrance, J.B. only later in life discovered and enjoyed Andrew Murray’s devotional writing.
The Indicatives of Grace as Prior to the Imperatives of Law

John Webster has argued that T.F.’s absence of attention to the subjective nature of sanctification is indicative of the problem that the objectivity of Christ’s vicarious humanity diminishes our own human response: ‘...the puzzling slightness of Torrance’s attention to moral theology in his published work betokens the way in which a theology of Christ’s vicarious humanity may dissolve the human action in incarnational grace.’ However, this is to misunderstand T.F.’s conception of human action. Christ’s vicarious humanity rightly diminishes any human response that is merit-based and therefore burdensome, and affirms human action in its proper place, that is, as a free and joyful response by the Spirit to what God has already accomplished in Christ.

Therefore, what is perhaps more puzzling about T.F.’s absence of attention to moral theology is that he does not take more fully the opportunity to articulate the proper place of human activity in the outworking of sanctification. Whilst T.F.’s concern to challenge works-righteousness might have held him back from this task, he could have both challenged works-righteousness and upheld the obligations of grace by defining the proper place of subjective sanctification as rooted in the objective accomplishment of Christ.

The grounding of the subjective outworking of sanctification in the objective accomplishment of Christ is another instance whereby ‘the Indicatives of grace are always prior to the obligations of law and human obedience’. Evident by his repeated affirmations, this is a crucial maxim for J.B., and although not explored in detail by the Torrances, it is true with regards to sanctification.

If the imperative to be holy is preached prior to, or in detachment from, the indicative truth that we are sanctified in Christ, we are thrown back upon ourselves to attempt to accomplish it for ourselves. However, the imperative to be holy is preceded by God’s indicative act of grace in Christ’s vicarious humanity whereby we have been made holy. Therefore, we are liberated to follow the imperative, not by relying upon our own resources, but by relying upon the vicarious humanity of Christ, in whom we may participate by the Spirit.

---

20 Noble seeks a reappraisal of Wesley’s doctrine of sanctification by doing what he perceives Wesley failed to do: the rooting of subjective sanctification in the objective Person and Work of Christ. See Noble, Holy Trinity. He suggests that Wesley failed to do this because he was influenced by scholastic seventeenth century federal categories (100). He writes, ‘The point is, of course, that the shape of what is sometimes called “subjective soteriology” is determined by “objective soteriology.” What is possible for us now in our Christian lives was determined by what Christ did for us then on the cross. In other words, what Christ does now, by his Spirit in us, is the outworking of what he did once and for all on the cross for us.’ 136-37.

Herman Bavinck’s distinction between ‘legal sanctification’ and ‘evangelical sanctification’ is valuable in this regard. Legal sanctification is the process whereby believers attempt to work out their own sanctification: ‘believers proceed to sanctify themselves by means of a holiness which they themselves newly and for the first time bring into being, or of one which exists already but which they by means of their exertion and good works must appropriate’.21 Evangelical sanctification, on the other hand, is rooted in God’s act of grace in Christ.22 The imperative call to be holy does not throw us back upon our own efforts because it is rooted in the indicative reality that we are sanctified in Christ.23

David Peterson has lamented that the indicative reality of our sanctification in Christ has not been given the primacy that it holds in Scripture as the basis for living holy lives.24 As Paul wrote, we have been set free from sin (Rom. 6:7); therefore we must not let sin reign (Rom. 6:12). In Paul’s writing, Hays observes that ‘the human moral action is given a distinct place in the syntax of the divine-human relationship; obedience is a consequence of salvation, not its condition.’25 This can be seen especially in Hebrews, which roots our subjective sanctification definitively in Christ’s once-for-all sacrifice.26 Seifrid considers that sanctification is presented in Hebrews in equivalent terms to justification in Paul’s letters: it is an accomplished reality in which we can share through Christ’s continuing high 21 Bavinck, Our Reasonable Faith, 479.

22 Ibid., 480-81.
23 Ibid., 481-82. Cf. Barth who rooted the imperative to live a holy life in the indicative sanctification which has already been achieved through Christ’s vicarious ‘no’ to sin and ‘yes’ to a new life: ‘Your sanctification is such that it has happened independently of your good or bad will, because the ‘no’ to sin and the ‘yes’ to a new life that has no more interest in sin, that has turned to God, is fixed for ever and is therefore valid already here and now. You must, you shall therefore no longer live the old life but move in the new life. For you have no other! You only have the life in fellowship with him who has taken sin, your sin, unto himself and who has done away with it, and who now has only the life with God before him. This is the power of the imperative of your sanctification.’ Karl Barth, A Shorter Commentary on Romans (London: SCM Press, 1959), 71.
24 David Peterson, Possessed by God: A New Testament Theology of Sanctification and Holiness (Leicester: Apollos, 1995), 14. Although Peterson understands justification in primarily forensic and declaratory terms, he stresses the definitive act of sanctification in Christ, recognising that if the imperative does not flow from the indicative, the outworking of sanctification ‘can so easily degenerate into a moralistic and perfectionist programme for believers to pursue’. Ibid., 137.
26 Noble, Holy Trinity, 41.
priesthood. He observes, ‘As in Paul, the imperative paradoxically flows out of the indicative.’

The implications of the Torrances’ objective soteriology for the outworking of sanctification are exemplified by Andrew Murray. In his devotional writings, he upholds both the imperative and indicative in their proper relationship. He stresses the imperative call to live a sanctified life but his exhortations are rooted in the indicative vicarious humanity of Christ. Murray perceives that, as both God and man, Jesus was able to fulfil both sides of the covenant. He also perceives that the atonement is not a mere external transaction that effects a retrospective forgiveness of sins but involves our intimate inclusion in Christ’s death so that we are prospectively liberated to share in Christ’s holiness:

We know what the death of Christ means as an atonement, and we never can emphasize too much that blessed substitution and bloodshedding, by which redemption was won for us. But let us remember, that is only half the meaning of His death. The other half is this: just as much as Christ was my substitute, who died for me, just so much He is my head, in whom, and with whom, I die; and just as He lives for me, to intercede, He lives in me, to carry out and to perfect His life.

Murray is conscious that Christ, although ascended, nevertheless remains in human flesh and continues to act as our vicarious High Priest and King: ‘As Priest He effected the cleansing of sins here below; as Priest-King He sits on the right hand of the throne to apply His work, in heavenly power to dispense its blessings, and maintain within us the heavenly life.’ We share in Christ’s sanctification by the Holy Spirit: ‘Christ is our sanctification, and the Holy Ghost comes to communicate Him to us, to work out all that is in Christ and to reproduce it in us.’ Murray stresses that ‘There is no other way of our becoming holy but by becoming partakers of the holiness of Christ.’

The indicative reality of the vicarious humanity of Christ gives Murray the confidence to stress the imperative call to be holy: ‘There is not, as so many think, one standard for 27 Seifrid, Christ, Our Righteousness, 178.

32 Murray, The Master’s Indwelling, 82.
33 Murray, Abide, 75.
Christ and another for His people. No, as branches of the vine, as members of the body, as partakers of the same Spirit, we may and therefore must bear the image of the Elder Brother. Yet although Murray presents a high calling, he does not place a burden upon the believer because it is rooted in the indicative reality of our sanctification in Christ:

Christ is not only our Surety who lived and died for us, our Example who showed us how to live and die, but also our Head, with whom we are one, in whose death we have died, in whose life we now live. This gives us the power to follow our Surety as our Example: Christ being our Head is the bond that makes the believing in the Surety and the following of the Example inseparably one.

The Inseparability of Justification and Sanctification in Christ

Noble suggests that the lack of emphasis on the subjective nature of sanctification particularly notable in Protestant theology is due to the atonement being connected strongly to justification but not to sanctification. He argues, ‘...the Christian tradition (perhaps particularly Protestant tradition) has worked with an over-tidy separation of justification from sanctification in a way that is not truly biblical. And it does not seem to have given the same thought to how the cross effected our sanctification.’ When our sanctification is not rooted definitively with justification in Christ, Noble considers, ‘we fit ourselves for heaven by the effort of our own sanctifying self-discipline.’ Similarly, Douglas Campbell has criticised attempts to explain the dialectical tension between divine and human agency by separating sanctification from justification. He argues that, in Paul, justification and sanctification are in parallel, not sequence. When sanctification is sequential to justification, this makes sanctification conditional upon our own endeavours. This is strongly condemned by G.C. Berkouwer as ‘a violation of the grace of God’ for ‘it posits a substitute for the grace of God or tries to complete it with human works.’

---

34 Murray, Like Christ, 232-33.
35 Ibid., 32.
36 Noble, Holy Trinity, 100.
37 Ibid., 135.
38 Ibid., 136.
39 Campbell, Deliverance of God, 185-87.
For this reason the Torrances are concerned by Federal Calvinism’s notion of a ‘second work’ of sanctification. They perceive this to be a serious distortion of Calvin’s teaching that justification and sanctification are inseparable in Christ. There is a notable difference between the older Reformation Catechisms and the Westminster Catechism in this regard. In the later Westminster Catechism, sanctification is presented as a subsequent stage to justification in the ordo salutis. Scholastic Protestant theology had separated sanctification from justification. This led to a change in preaching whereby, instead of being directed to Christ, congregations were urged to work out their own sanctification. J.B. observes that the discussion of sanctification in the Westminster Confession places its focus on the believer rather than on Christ who is sanctified for us or the believer’s participation in him: ‘The emphasis is on what has to happen to us and in us, rather than on the One Baptism of Christ, in which we are given to participate.’ T.F. considers,

In the Westminster theology the main focus of attention is upon man’s appropriation of salvation through justifying faith and the working out of sanctification. Ultimately the main content of these Catechisms is concerned with man’s action, man’s obedience, man’s duty toward God, man’s duty to his neighbour, and man’s religion.

People are also thrown back upon themselves when sanctification is conceived of as a ‘second blessing’ in some streams of Pentecostalism. Holiness teaching, influenced by a form of John Wesley’s notion of perfection, has been adopted into Pentecostal denominations such as the Church of God, the Pentecostal Holiness Church and the Church of God in Christ. According to Holiness teaching, there is a second blessing subsequent to conversion whereby the believer receives entire sanctification. The separation of sanctification from justification can lead to the problem, as Tom Smail observed, of people trying to accomplish their own sanctification:

All second blessing teaching whether of a Pentecostal or ‘holiness’ type, is in danger of dividing the Christian life into a salvation which is gift to the sinner, and the fullness of the Spirit which is reward of the saint, and thus maligning the central gospel principle that from beginning to end it is all of grace. 48

As with the notion of a ‘second work’, sanctification as a ‘second blessing’ is presented as a subsequent stage to justification in the ordo salutis. 49 Sanctification is separated from its definitive ground with justification in Christ which means that people then feel the need to attempt to achieve it themselves.

Hauerwas considers that the rooting of sanctification with justification takes seriously the implications of our sanctification whilst also defying a moralistic interpretation:

The dialectical interdependence of justification and sanctification is a way of indicating the real effect of Christ’s work upon the believer without separating that effect from its source. Justification is a necessary aspect of sanctification in order that “Christ for us” is kept at the center of the Christian life. This emphasis always erects a permanent barrier to any attempt to interpret the Christian life in a moralistic fashion. Sanctification must be equally emphasized, however, to prevent understanding Christ’s work in a way that separates it from the effect it has on the believer. 50

This rooting of sanctification with justification is a compelling feature of the Torrances’ soteriology. What holds the two together is the vicarious humanity of Christ. For the Torrances, the vicarious humanity of Christ means that ‘Christ takes our place and represents us, so that what is true of him is true of us, and what he did in his (our) humanity is ours.’ 51 This is what they believe is expressed by Jesus’ assertion, “For them I sanctify myself that they too may be truly sanctified” (John 17:19). 52 They also believe it to be indicative in Paul’s claim that Christ ‘became for us wisdom from God, and righteousness and sanctification and redemption’ (1 Cor. 1:30). 53

---

48 Smail, Reflected Glory, 48-9.
49 Pointing to the perfect passive participle ‘hegiasmesnois’ in Acts 26:18 and 20:32, Peterson argues that sanctification is not an event subsequent to forgiveness in the ordo salutis. This means that it cannot be deemed a ‘second work’ or ‘second blessing’. He argues that, in the New Testament, when the verb ‘hagiazein’ (to sanctify) and noun ‘hagiasmos’ (sanctification) are used, they emphasise the once-for-all saving work of God in Christ. Peterson, Possessed by God, 55; 27.
50 Hauerwas, Character and the Christian Life, 188. He goes on to assert, ‘This is what prevents the Christian life from being reduced to an intellectual adherence to certain beliefs.’
51 T.F.T., Incarnation, 205.
52 J.B.T., ‘Christ in our place’, 45; T.F.T, Trinitarian Faith, 167; T.F.T., Reconciliation, 141.
53 T.F.T., Atonement, 129. Bavinck is also keen to root sanctification with justification in Christ. He insists that sanctification is ‘perfectly achieved’ in Christ and argues, ‘In order to understand the Following Athanasius, T.F. describes the very act of the Word assuming human flesh as sanctifying our human nature.

...God has joined himself to us in our estranged human life in order to sanctify it, to gather it into union with his own holy life and so lift it up above and beyond all the downward drag of sin and decay, and that he already does simply by being one with man in all things. Thus the act of becoming incarnate is itself the sanctification of our human life in Jesus Christ...

Yet the incarnation was only the beginning of the sanctification of humanity, for it was also wrought out for and in us throughout Christ’s earthly life. The Holy Spirit’s descent upon Jesus at his baptism was ‘for our sanctification’. Jesus then lived a life by the Spirit of perfect faithfulness to the Father for our sanctification. As J.B. asserts, ‘In our name, on our behalf, in a human body, Jesus lived a life of prayer, a life in the Spirit in communion with the Father, to sanctify our humanity.’ Jesus’ faithfulness to the Father even led him to submit to death on the cross, whereby the old fallen nature of humanity was crucified and buried. Humanity is therefore sanctified both by Jesus’ active and passive obedience. J.B. writes,

The Son of God takes our humanity, sanctifies it by his vicarious life in the Spirit (John 17:17-18), carries it to the grave to be crucified and buried in him, and in his resurrection and ascension carries it into the holy presence of God. ‘And by that will, we have been made holy through the sacrifice of the body of Jesus Christ once for all’ (Heb 10:10).

This once-for-all rooting of sanctification with justification in the vicarious humanity of Christ is crucial in order to avoid people being thrown back upon themselves to try and achieve sanctification by their own endeavours. T.F. perceives that when sanctification is 54 T.F.T., Reconciliation, 53; cf. ‘In his holy assumption of our unholy humanity, his purity wipes away our impurity, his holiness covers our corruption, his nature heals our nature.’ T.F.T., Reconstruction, 155-56.

---

55 T.F.T., Incarnation, 66.
56 T.F.T., Trinitarian Faith, 167.
57 Ibid., 190.
58 J.B.T., Passion, 47. Cf. T.F.T., Mediation, 81. For a further elaboration of the role of the Spirit in the sanctifying events of Jesus’ vicarious life, see Noble, Holy Trinity, 184-91.
59 T.F.T., Reconstruction, 155.
60 J.B.T., ‘Christ in our place’, 62.
rooted definitively with justification in the vicarious humanity of Christ, there is no need for the believer to try and achieve it for himself:

Justification by grace alone remains the sole ground of the Christian life; we never advance beyond it, as if justification were only the beginning of a new self-righteousness, the beginning of a life of sanctification which is what we do in response to justification. Of course we are summoned to live out day by day what we already are in Christ through his self-consecration or sanctification, but sanctification is not what we do in addition to what God has done in justification.

The Holy Spirit as the Means by whom we Participate in Christ

The Torrances believe that we live out day by day what we already are through participating by means of the Holy Spirit in Christ. Without the once-for-all self-consecration of Jesus’ vicarious humanity, we turn to examining our own efforts introspectively as a means to achieving sanctification. Yet our holiness is found definitively in Christ and therefore the role of the Spirit is to turn us out of ourselves to share in Christ’s sanctification. T.F. describes this as ‘opening us up within our subjectivities for Christ in such a radical way that we find our life not in ourselves but out of ourselves, objectively in him’.

This notion of participating by the Spirit in Christ has been challenged by John Webster. His concern with the concept of ‘participation’ is primarily with regards to his disbelief that it has a convincing Scriptural basis, but also his apprehension that it does not take seriously the distinction between the Creator and creature. Webster proposes

---

62 J.B.T., ‘Priesthood of Jesus’, 165-66; cf. J.B.T., ‘Christ in our place’, 48; T.F.T., Atonement, 387: ‘Because the church is the body of Christ in which he dwells, the temple of the Holy Spirit in which God is present, its members live the very life of Christ through the Holy Spirit, partaking of and living out the holy life of God.’ Cf. Barth, Church Dogmatics IV/2, 517: ‘As we are not asked to justify ourselves, we are not asked to sanctify ourselves. Our sanctification consists in our participation in His sanctification as grounded in the efficacy and revelation of the grace of Jesus Christ.’
63 T.F.T., Reconstruction, 238.
conceiving of the relationship between the Creator and creature in terms of ‘fellowship’ instead of participation.\textsuperscript{65}

Daniel A. Keating has sought to address these concerns of Webster. Keating argues that Scripture does describe God’s relationship with humanity in terms of participation. Both Paul and John write of a real indwelling and abiding of humanity in God. Keating also argues that the concept of participation does not necessarily entail denial of the distinction between Creator and creature. He points to how the Christian tradition has upheld the distinction between Creator and creature by understanding participation as a sharing in the divine life not by nature but by grace. He upholds eminent figures such as Athanasius (\textit{Contra Arianos} 1.9) and Augustine (\textit{Enarrationes} in \textit{Psalmos} 49.2) in this regard.\textsuperscript{66} Julie Canlis has also sought to defend the concept of participation from Webster’s critique. She points to Calvin’s discussion of the insufficiency of ‘fellowship’ as a concept and argues that participation, expressed by the word \textit{koinonia} in the New Testament, is considerably different from a Platonic notion of consubstantiality.\textsuperscript{67}

Whilst it is a valid concern that some modern ecclesiologies may blur the distinction between Creator and creature, this is not the outcome of T.F.’s theology.\textsuperscript{68} Webster recognises that T.F. is very cautious in this regard.\textsuperscript{69} T.F. is emphatically clear that creatures remain human as they share in the life of God:

\begin{quote}
The staggering thing about this is that the exaltation of the human nature into the life of God does not mean the disappearance of man or the swallowing up of human and creaturely being in the infinite ocean of the divine being, but rather that human nature, while remaining creaturely and human, is yet exalted in Christ to share in God’s life and glory.\textsuperscript{70}
\end{quote}

\textsuperscript{65} Webster, \textit{Holiness}, 57; 62. Webster believes that the Scriptural references to ‘in the Lord’ and ‘in the Spirit’ refer to fellowship, not participation. Ibid., 62.

\textsuperscript{68} Webster shows concern for social trinitarianism in the context of his critique of participation. See Webster, \textit{Holiness}, 54-56.

\textsuperscript{69} Webster, ‘T.F. Torrance 1913-2007’, 370.

\textsuperscript{70} T.F.T., \textit{Atonement}, 294.
Therefore, the confusion of Creator and creature cannot be a reason to dismiss T.F.’s notion of participation.

Moreover, the concept of participation is essential in expressing the truth that the outworking of sanctification is not an autonomous and burdensome human endeavour. Although it may be recognised that sanctification is objectively rooted with justification in Christ, we can nevertheless be thrown back upon ourselves when the subjective outworking is conceived of in external, logico-causal categories: God did His part in Christ; now we must do our part with the help of the Holy Spirit. This perspective conceives of a necessity for us, aided by the Spirit, to apply the benefits of Christ to our lives in order to, as Paul expresses it, ‘work out your salvation’ (Phil. 2:12).

Webster seeks to avoid the problem of people being thrown back upon their own autonomous actions by rooting sanctification in the Father’s election:

Our thinking about sanctification would be disorderly if we were to suggest that, although in the matter of reconciliation we have to talk of a divine determination, when we move to speak of human holiness we are required to shift to talk of our own agency, perhaps co-operating with God, perhaps rendering God his due for the gift of salvation. But, if we are elected to holiness, then we have been extracted from the sphere of human autonomy; the Christian’s holiness does not stem from the Christian’s decision.

This rooting of sanctification in election is important in affirming its objectivity and therefore affirming that it does not depend upon our own endeavours. However, if the outworking of sanctification is not a participation by the Spirit in Christ’s holiness, our actions become a logico-causal response which places a burden upon the believer. Webster conceives of the practical outworking of sanctification in terms of putting aside what has been put to death (mortificatio) and living out what has been made alive (vivificatio).

Similarly, Anthony A. Hoekema describes the ‘present experiential’ outworking of 71 Smail also recognises the problem of perceiving the Holy Spirit merely as our aid: ‘...it is not surprising that when the Christian life is understood as having its origin in a human choice of faith, it should also be seen to continue through human efforts after faithfulness, obedience, sanctification, where no doubt the Spirit appears as subsidiary helper at each stage, but where the initiative is seen to rest upon us, so that we are urged to a series of decisive steps towards our own consecration, and promised his help only when we have taken them.’ Smail, Reflected Glory, 84. Cf. Berkouwer: ‘We may never speak of sanctification as if we are entering – having gone through the gate of justification – upon a new, independent field of operation...’. Berkouwer, Faith and Sanctification, 42.

---

72 Webster, Holiness, 79-80; 60.

73 Ibid., 88-89.
sanctification in terms of a logico-causal response to the ‘past historical’ act of God in Christ. Although objectively the believer has died with Christ, subjectively, he has a life-long process of fighting against sin by putting off his old self and putting on his new self. Hoekema places responsibility on the believer by employing the external category of becoming more like Christ by following his example.74 Similarly, Sinclair B. Ferguson describes the outworking of sanctification in external, logico-causal terms of the application of Christ’s benefits by the Spirit: ‘All that is true for me in Christ has not yet been accomplished in me by the Spirit.’75

Although we are indeed summoned to live out our sanctification, the Holy Spirit does not aid us in the external, logico-causal application of Christ’s definitive sanctification. This would be to detach the outworking of sanctification from the vicarious humanity of Christ, thereby making the reality of our sanctification only a potentiality which demands our efforts for its actualisation. This then places a burden upon humanity so that the outworking of sanctification becomes the impossible task of an autonomous believer.

What Hoekema termed the ‘present experiential’ must be understood as a participation in the ‘past historical’. The believer does not apply what Christ has accomplished; he participates in what Christ has accomplished.76 When the believer puts off the old self and puts on the new self (Col. 3:5-12), this is a participation in the death and resurrection of Christ. Sanctification is a reality in which we participate, rather than a potentiality to be actualised. As Gary Deddo writes,

What is complete and actual in Christ is truly and really ours even if it does not yet appear to be so. Our lives are hidden in Christ (Col. 3:3). Our life in him is being worked out in us by the Spirit. But this new being wrought in us comes through the sheer gift of our union with Christ. It does not come through our working out a potential that might be true if we properly apply ourselves. Rather 76 For Barth too, the definitive act of sanctification in Christ means that there is nothing humanity can contribute. We can only accept it as ‘an accomplished fact’ in which we may participate: ‘He Himself has accomplished it in a way which is effective and authoritative for all, for His whole people and all its individual members, and ultimately for the whole world. The fact that it is accomplished in Jesus as our Lord and Head means that we are asked for our obedience, or supremely our love; just as the fact that our justification is accomplished in Him means that we are asked for our faith. There is no prior or subsequent contribution that we can make to its accomplishment.’ Barth, Church Dogmatics IV/2, 516-17.

---

the Christian life is living out and manifesting the present reality of our union with Christ.\textsuperscript{77}

The Holy Spirit does not enable the autonomous believer to work out his own sanctification; the Holy Spirit enables the believer to participate in Christ's definitive sanctification. Perhaps a helpful addition to J.B.'s maxim would be that the obligations of law are not only subsequent to, but a very participation in the indicatives of grace. This liberates humanity from the burden of depending upon our own endeavours for the outworking of sanctification in our lives.

Conclusion

The Torrances appear to be somewhat characteristic of their Reformed tradition in their emphasis upon the objective work of God and lack of exploration of the subjective nature of sanctification. Whilst this may have been due to a concern to avoid moralism, the Torrances' soteriology actually offers the crucial foundation for challenging moralism whilst also appreciating the obligations of grace. Therefore, this chapter has sought to explore the implications of the Torrances' soteriology for the outworking of sanctification.

The Torrances root sanctification objectively with justification in Christ. We have been sanctified once-for-all through Christ's vicarious humanity. This is significant because when sanctification is made subsequent to justification, as in the Federal notion of a 'second work' or Pentecostal 'second blessing', it is separated from its definitive ground with justification in Christ and the danger is that people find themselves thrown back upon their own resources to attempt to achieve it themselves. However, when sanctification is rooted definitively with justification in the vicarious humanity of Christ, there is no burden upon us to achieve it ourselves.

The Torrances conceive of the subjective outworking of this definitive sanctification in terms of participating by the Holy Spirit in Christ. If the subjective outworking of sanctification is an external, logico-causal response by the Christian, aided by the Spirit but detached from the vicarious humanity of Christ, it becomes an autonomous, burdensome endeavour. However, the Holy Spirit does not enable the autonomous Christian to work out his own sanctification; the Spirit enables him to participate in Christ's definitive sanctification. This liberates humanity from the burden of depending upon our own endeavours for the subjective outworking of sanctification.

\textsuperscript{77} Deddo, 'The Christian Life', 142.

It must be stressed that participation in the divine life does not entail a loss of creaturely being, nor does the objectivity of our sanctification diminish any possibility of our own human response. It rightly diminishes any human response that is merit-based and therefore burdensome, but it also affirms human action in its proper place as a free and joyful participation by the Spirit in what God has already accomplished in Christ.

This is a valuable contribution because, when the imperative to be holy is made prior to, or detached from, the indicative truth that we are sanctified in Christ, we are thrown back upon ourselves to attempt to accomplish it. However, a significant implication of the Torrances’ soteriology is that the imperative to be holy is preceded by God’s indicative act of grace in Christ. Therefore, we are set free to follow the imperative, not by relying upon our own resources, but by relying upon the vicarious humanity of Christ, in whom we may participate by the Spirit. Liberated from any burdensome, moralistic notion of sanctification, we are free, motivated and inspired to grow into the reality of our holiness in Christ, the nature of which shall be explored in the following chapter.
Growing up into Christ: Ontological over External

The objective rooting of sanctification with justification in the vicarious humanity of Christ liberates us to grow into the reality of our holiness as we participate by the Spirit in Christ. It is the purpose of this chapter to explore more fully the nature of our holiness and our growth into Christ by taking into account both the eschatological reserve created by Christ’s ascension and our new eschatological orientation in the risen humanity of Christ. This chapter seeks to argue that the Torrances’ scheme of salvation corrects a poor perspective of humanity and a powerless resignation to sin, instead offering confidence in the outworking of our sanctification.

The eschatological reserve created by Jesus’ ascension means that sinfulness is a continuing presence as we await the full manifestation of our sanctification at the Parousia. Nevertheless, although hidden, our holiness is a definitive reality, which means that we do not depend upon our own endeavours in an external process of becoming progressively more holy. The outworking of our sanctification comes from a place of rest in what Christ has already accomplished and is a process of the unveiling of that reality.

We have been given a new eschatological orientation in the risen humanity of Christ, whereby we are able to share by the Spirit in Christ’s risen and ascended humanity here and now. This is our primary ontological reality that challenges a poor view of humanity defined primarily in terms of sinfulness, which is fuelled by an external understanding of the atonement that cannot truly transform humanity. The ontological transformation of our humanity through the vicarious humanity of Christ means that humanity is truly holy and it is important to affirm this reality. Our boast is not in ourselves but in Christ and it most honours God to accept our new nature and clothe ourselves with Christ.

The eschatological orientation of the risen humanity of Christ means that we do not have a life-long struggle with sin. Although in one sense the ascension means the removal of Christ from the world, in another sense it means that humanity is raised up and seated in heavenly places in Christ. As we participate by the Spirit in Christ, from this place of victory and rest, the outworking of sanctification does not have to be a struggle. Grounded in the realism of the eschatological tension, this does not lead to triumphalism, but it reflects the optimism of the Biblical witness that although humanity lives in the eschatological reserve, in a world of continuing sin and evil, it is neither defined nor ruled by it. We have confidence to grow into the reality of who we are in Christ.

The Eschatological Reserve created by Christ’s Ascension

Through God’s objective sanctifying work in the vicarious humanity of Christ, humanity has been made definitively holy. Yet after the old Adamic flesh was crucified and buried and humanity had been resurrected to new life, Christ ascended to heaven. On account of Christ’s continuing ascended humanity, the Church is united to Christ by the Spirit. This means that in one sense he is present to us, yet in another sense his ascension means a withdrawal from us; Christ is at one and the same time both present and absent. The absence of Christ after the ascension establishes an ‘eschatological reserve’:\(^1\)

On the one hand, then, the Church through the Spirit is joined to the Body of the risen Christ and is One Body with Him; but on the other hand, Christ has removed His Body from us so that we have to think of the relation of the Church to the risen Body of Christ in terms of the distance of the ascension and the nearness of His parousia in Glory. There is an eschatological reserve in the relation of our union with Christ, an eschatological lag waiting for the last Word or the final Act of God. There is an element of pure immediacy in the Church’s relation to the risen Body of Christ so that His parousia is a presence here and now through the Spirit. But there is also an element in the Church’s relation to the risen Body of Christ which from our experience and our understanding is still in arrears and awaits the divine fulfilment. Christ has distanced His Body from us and yet through His Spirit He has come and filled the Church with His own Self. In one sense, then, the Church is already One Body with Christ – that has once for all taken place in the crucifixion, resurrection, and in Pentecost – and yet the Church is still to become One Body.²

---

This eschatological reserve means that there is an eschatological tension between the hidden and the manifest. Although the Church is already One Body with Christ, this truth is partly hidden and not fully manifest.³ The Kingdom of God is a present but veiled reality.⁴ We are conscious of the end because it has broken into the present through Christ’s vicarious life but it remains beyond our grasp because of his ascension and awaited Parousia.⁵

T.F.’s understanding of the eschatological reserve has significant implications for the nature of the outworking of our sanctification. First, it means that the outworking of sanctification is not an external process of becoming progressively more holy, which throws us back upon our own endeavours.⁶ This would be to rely upon a linear conception of time. Yet we do not become any more holy through the progression of time. We have already been made completely holy in Christ. The progression of time only serves the unveiling of this definitive reality. The eschatological tension is not between humanity being partially holy and partially unholy, but between the hidden reality of our holiness and its full manifestation. The definitive, ontological reality of our sanctification in Christ means that there is nothing that we can do to make ourselves any more holy. The outworking of sanctification is the process of the unveiling of the reality of our sanctification in Christ.

Second, as a process of unveiling the definitive reality of our sanctification, the outworking of sanctification does not depend upon our own endeavours. The eschatological reserve does not mean that holiness is a potentiality that we must work to attain, but rather an ontological reality that we can look forward to being revealed. T.F. writes, ‘The final parousia of Christ will be more the apocalypse or unveiling of the perfected reality of what Christ has done than the consummating of what till then is an incomplete reality.’ T.F.’s eschatology is criticised by Stanley MacLean for reducing the eschatological nature of the church to an unveiling of what it already is. Yet this is an essential truth if humanity is not to be thrown back upon its own resources.

⁴ Ibid., 16.
⁵ Ibid., 5.
⁶ Hauerwas considers that the language of ‘growth’ in holiness can lend itself to a moralistic distortion whereby our own efforts make us more holy. Hauerwas, Character and the Christian Life, 218.

Third, although the unveiling of our sanctification does not depend upon our own endeavours, this does not deny our subjective human activity but rather puts it in its proper place. In stressing the objective and definitive activity of Christ, T.F. is often misunderstood as disregarding our subjective human activity. MacLean is critical of T.F.’s eschatology for being ‘christologically over-determined’; in laying emphasis on Christological objectivity, MacLean perceives T.F. as diminishing human subjectivity. Yet the only subjective human activity that T.F. diminishes is that which is enslaved by a contractual conception of our relationship with God. T.F. stresses Christ’s vicarious humanity in our place because it is only by wholly sanctifying us in himself that our subjective human activity is liberated from its own endeavours. We are set free from the burden of trying to accomplish our own sanctification and enabled to participate by the Spirit in Christ’s holiness.

This means at one and the same time that we can rest in what has been decisively accomplished in Christ but also that we can be active in leading holy lives. We typically think

---

7 T.F.T., ‘Eschatology’, 10. Cf. ‘...the New Testament constantly thinks of the Parousia in terms of Epiphany, for the relation between the today (semeron) and the eschaton is much more a tension between the hidden and the manifest, the veiled and the unveiled, than between dates in calendar time. What is still in the future is the full unveiling of a reality, but the reality itself is fully present here and now.’ T.F.T., ‘Eschatology’, 7.
10 MacLean, Resurrection, Apocalypse and the Kingdom, 198-99. The Torrance brothers would perhaps also be included in Hauerwas’ criticism of those who emphasise God’s objective work in order to counteract anthropocentrism in sanctification, which Hauerwas believes to be at the expense of our subjective response. Hauerwas, Character and the Christian Life, 130-41, 157, 170-75. To redress the balance in the dialectical tension between what God has done (indicative) and our human subjective response (imperative), he calls for an ‘ethics of character’, mindful that God’s objective work demands a response from humanity of growth in sanctification. Yet Hauerwas does not have a concept of participation in Christ and therefore runs the risk of throwing us back upon ourselves.
in external, logico-causal categories so that rest is an activity that follows work; we work for a time and then we rest from work. Yet the Torrances’ scheme of salvation presents our work as coming out of a place of rest and satisfaction in what has been definitively accomplished in Christ. We cannot understand the outworking of sanctification in logico-causal categories of becoming progressively more holy or working out for ourselves what has been accomplished in Christ. The Biblical witness exhorts the Christian to put his ‘effort’ into entering God’s ‘rest’ (Heb. 4:11), which is perhaps indicative of the impossibility of fitting divine and human agency into logico-causal categories. Both an external, logico-causal paradigm and a participatory paradigm lead to exertion on the part of the Christian. However, the crucial difference is that an external, logico-causal perspective makes this exertion a burden, whereas participation by the Spirit in Christ is radically freeing because it is rooted in a place of rest in what Christ has already accomplished.

Fourth, the eschatological reserve means that our sanctification will not be fully manifest until the Parousia. Sinfulness is a continuing reality manifest in the present, which Paul argued was evident in the lives of the early Christians. Paul describes the Romans as ‘full of goodness’ yet he continues, ‘Nevertheless, on some points I have written to you rather boldly by way of reminder, because of the grace given me by God to be a minister of Christ to the Gentiles in the priestly service of the gospel of God, so that the offering of the Gentiles may be acceptable, sanctified by the Holy Spirit’ (Rom. 15:14-16). In the preceding chapters (Rom. 12-14), Paul sets out ways in which the Romans could lead holy lives which indicates that they had not been living up to these standards. Paul

---

11 T.F.T., Atonement, 33; 313. Cf. J.B.T.: ‘What has been realized for us intensively in Christ will one day be revealed extensively in a new heaven and a new earth.’ J.B.T., ‘The Priesthood of Jesus’, 166. Cf. ‘Jesus Christ is present in the power of the Spirit, but the same Spirit keeps us in suspense (suspension). The end is not yet. Now we are the children of God, enjoying real communion with Jesus Christ, the whole Christ. It does not yet appear what we shall be, but when he appears we shall be like him, and enjoy endless communion with him.’ J.B.T., Worship, 82. Scriptural support for this may include: Paul writes of his expectation of the return of Jesus, when the Philippians will see themselves conformed to his likeness: ‘But our citizenship is in heaven, and it is from there that we are expecting a Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ. He will transform the body of our humiliation that it may be conformed to the body of his glory, by the power that also enables him to make all things subject to himself’ (Phil. 3:20). Similarly, the first letter to John asserts, ‘Beloved, we are God’s children now, and what we will be has not yet appeared; but we know that when he appears we shall be like him, because we shall see him as he is’ (1 Jn. 3:2). Paul describes to the Corinthians a process of transformation into the likeness of Christ: ‘And all of us, with unveiled faces, seeing the glory of the Lord as though reflected in a mirror, are being transformed into the same image from one degree of glory to another’ (2 Cor. 3:18). In his letter to the Romans, Paul looks forward to the ‘glory that will be revealed in us’ (Rom. 8:18). He writes, ‘For the creation waits in eager expectation for the children of God to be revealed’ (Rom. 8:19). Similarly, the first letter of Peter speaks of ‘a salvation ready to be revealed in the last time’ (1 Pet. 1:3-5). This Biblical witness suggests that our true identity in Christ will not be wholly revealed until his return and so our sanctification awaits full manifestation. acknowledges the Corinthians’ quarrelling (1 Cor. 1:11; 3:3; 11:18), sexual immorality (5:1) and boasting (4:19; 5:6) and explicitly admonishes their immoral behaviour (1 Cor. 4:14). He admonishes the Galatians for beginning in the Spirit but returning to the flesh (Gal. 3:3; 4:9-10). He also exhorts the Ephesians and Colossians to put off the old man (Eph. 4:22; Col. 3:8-9). Sinfulness is a continuing presence in the lives of Christians as we await the full manifestation of our sanctification, and so T.F. would assert, ‘This Tom Torrance you see is full of corruption, but the real Tom Torrance is hid with Christ in God and will be revealed only when Jesus Christ comes again.’

The eschatological tension between the hidden and the manifest leads T.F. to criticise two eschatologies that deny an eschatological reserve. The first, ‘realised eschatology’, asserts the complete fulfilment of the Kingdom of God. The second, ‘realised teleology’, identifies the Kingdom with the Church and perceives the Church to be an extension of the incarnation. Essentially, they affirm that either the teleological or the eschatological end is realised in the present. T.F. contends that the Kingdom awaits full manifestation in order to give humanity time to hear the gospel and respond to God. Eschatology cannot be thought of in purely linear terms because the Kingdom of God is present whilst also being hidden. Moreover, to deny the eschatological reserve is to contradict the sacraments of baptism and the Eucharist.

While on the one hand we are given the real presence of the whole Christ, yet on the other hand that is to be realised in sacramental obedience enacted into our daily life. It is a reconciliation, as we have seen, thrust into a world that continues in its estrangement from and contradiction to God, and that is why in addition to the sacrament of baptism we have the eucharist. We are taught thereby that while in new time we are complete in Christ Jesus, yet in the conflicts and 12 Cf. Robert L. Saucy, “Sinners” who are Forgiven or “Saints” who Sin?” in Bibliotheca Sacra 152 (1995), 403-4. Saucy cites the following Biblical passages as evidence that Christians still sin: they are described as behaving carnally (1 Cor. 3:1-3); there is promise of the cleansing of their sin (1 John 1:7); confession of sins is written of in the present tense (1 John 1:9); John wrote that those who claim to be without sin deceive themselves (1 John 1:8); Paul exhorted the Ephesians and Colossians to put off the old man (Eph. 4:22; Col. 3:8-9).

---

15 Ibid., 18-19.
16 Ibid., 33. This critique applies to Pentecostal Perfectionism, which affirms full manifestation of our sanctification.
18 Ibid., 29-30.
19 Ibid., 20.
abstractions of fallen time we are unable to realise that wholeness, but must nevertheless reckon that we are dead to the old life and created again in the new. That means that while in faith we are a new creation yet we are unable as yet to join body and soul, the invisible and the visible, the material and the spiritual, etc., in any closer union than is given to us in the tensions of the Cross through holy communion.\(^\text{20}\)

Baptism and the Eucharist are indicative of the eschatological tension as they remind us at one and the same time of both Christ’s presence and our estrangement from him.\(^\text{21}\) As the Church lives in the eschatological reserve between Christ’s ascension and Parousia, ‘It is still characterised by sin and evil and partakes of the decay and corruption of the world of which it is a part,’ T.F. writes, ‘so that it is not yet what it shall be, and not yet wholly in itself what it is already in Christ.’\(^\text{22}\)

The Eschatological Orientation of the Risen Humanity of Christ

Although the Church lives in the eschatological reserve between the ascension and Parousia, partaking of the corruption of the world, it has been given a new eschatological orientation whereby it ‘lives a life from beyond itself, and therefore looks beyond the historical forms of its orders to find its true being and form in the risen Humanity of Christ’.\(^\text{23}\) T.F. writes of the Church, ‘Their true being is hid with Christ in God. The whole focus of their vision and the whole perspective of their life in Christ’s name will be directed to the final unveiling of that reality of their new being at the parousia... ’\(^\text{24}\) The Church is turned out of itself to find its true identity in Christ’s risen humanity. It is ‘caught up in the onward and outward thrust of the resurrection of Christ toward the new creation’.\(^\text{25}\) MacLean writes, ‘The church of course cannot simply extricate itself from the power of nomos. It is still involved in the structural \(^\text{20}\) Ibid., 37.

---

\(^\text{21}\) For more of T.F.’s view of the sacraments, see T.F.T., Atonement, 413-24. He considers that the New Testament expresses the union and distance between Christ and the church through two images: (1) the church as the body of Christ and; (2) the church as the bride of Christ.

\(^\text{22}\) T.F.T., Atonement, 312.

\(^\text{24}\) T.F.T., Atonement, 314.

\(^\text{25}\) T.F.T., Space, Time and Resurrection, 105.
forms of this fallen world, and it has its mission within this world. But these forms must be “relativized,” since the church is given a “new orientation within” them.\textsuperscript{26} As Smail asserts:

Thus if we wish to measure the possibilities of our humanity, whether in the realm of its sanctification or its empowering, we are not to look at ourselves and scale Christ down to us, or worship the goodness and greatness of a divinity that is in principle inaccessible to us, but we are to look at him, to behold the Man that he is, and therefore the men that we shall be in him.\textsuperscript{27}

The eschatological reserve does not discourage T.F. from remaining positive that the end has already come with the incarnation of Christ. In one sense, there is no delay of the \textit{Parousia} because Christ’s life, death, resurrection, ascension and second advent are one redemptive event.\textsuperscript{28} Our salvation is definitive; there is nothing left to be achieved. What the future awaits is a full manifestation of that reality. Whilst the word ‘apocalypse’ tends towards a negative connotation today, in T.F.’s theology it is positively associated with the final unveiling of God’s redemptive purposes.\textsuperscript{29} He asserts, ‘Apocalypse is the unveiling to faith of the new creation as yet hidden from our eyes behind the ugly shapes of sinful history, but a new creation already consummated and waiting for eschatological unfolding or fulfilment in the advent presence of Christ.’\textsuperscript{30} This means that T.F. is less concerned with the last things, as is typical in eschatology, and more concerned with the significance of Christ’s resurrection power in the present.\textsuperscript{31} MacLean comments that T.F.’s eschatology is more about the \textit{Eschatos} (Last One), than the \textit{eschata} (last things).\textsuperscript{32}

The Church is able to share by the Spirit in the new risen humanity of Christ in the present.\textsuperscript{33} T.F. describes the Church as ‘the new humanity within the world, the provisional

\begin{footnotes}
\item[26] MacLean, \textit{Resurrection, Apocalypse and the Kingdom}, 177.
\item[27] Smail, \textit{Reflected Glory}, 70-71.
\item[31] MacLean, \textit{Resurrection, Apocalypse and the Kingdom}, 9; 23; 195. MacLean gives an example from T.F.’s sermon on 2 Pet. 3 where he is not interested in the apocalyptic return of Christ; ‘Instead, his message is about meeting the eternal God in the midst of time’ (29).
\item[32] Ibid., 19. T.F.’s eschatology is thoroughly Christocentric. MacLean describes his eschatology as a ‘component’ of his Christology (xvi).
\item[33] T.F.T., \textit{Reconstruction}, 248. The Spirit is the Spirit of Holiness who ‘comes to us from the triumphant obedience and victory of Christ in his Cross and Resurrection, as the Spirit clothed with mighty, redemptive acts transmitting the energy of Christ’s risen and glorified Humanity, and as the \end{footnotes}
manifold of the new creation within the old’.

Here T.F. aligns himself more with Calvin than Luther. Calvin believes that, as the Church participates in Christ, the glory of the new creation can to an extent be manifest; for Luther, the new humanity, whilst a reality, remains wholly concealed. Like T.F., Calvin perceives the eschatological tension arising between what has been accomplished and what is visibly manifest; for Luther, the eschatological tension arises between a ‘having’ and a ‘not having’. T.F. ascribes the greater optimism in Calvin’s eschatology to the influence of the Greek Fathers, as opposed to the somewhat more pessimistic Latin tradition which had a larger influence on Luther.

T.F. is critical of Luther for not appreciating more fully the significance of Christ’s resurrected humanity for the present:

It was not that Luther had no sense of the new creation either as regards the Church or as regards the individual believer, but that his weak stress on the renewal of the whole creation tended to rob it of temporal relevance and force ... [and] means that the believer does not really learn to live on the resurrection side of the Cross.

T.F. associates this problem in part to a negative emphasis on peccator over justus: ‘...the realisation, inherent in the justus et peccator dialectic, that before God the believer is always in the wrong, helped him at times to lose sight of the new creation in Christ as already accomplished fact, as a ‘perfectum praesens’.

T.F. follows his Reformed tradition in holding to Luther’s conviction that the believer is simul justus et peccator. Yet it is justus that is our primary reality in Christ and which describes the eschatological orientation of humanity. Although the simul justus et peccator dialectic expresses well the continuing Spirit of him who has entered into the new life and inherited all the promises of God, and therefore he comes in all the transforming power of the Saviour and Redeemer of men’ (248).

---

34 T.F.T., School of Faith, cxxi.
36 Ibid., 142.
38 T.F.T., Kingdom and Church, 72.
39 Ibid.
40 Much debate as to how to understand simul justus et peccator has been raised in recent years by the New Finnish Interpretation of Luther which interprets his doctrine of justification in participatory rather than external terms; cf. Mannermaa, Christ Present in Faith.
reality of sin, Hays considers that there is a danger that it may ‘underestimate the transformative power of God’s grace’. As Matt Jenson argues, although humanity is still peccator until the Parousia, it is only a ‘secondary reality’ or ‘non-ontological status’. To make it a primary or an ontological reality is to dispense with Christ:

To speak of persons in the first light of sin, even to speak of them as that which sin is not, is to circumscribe humanity within boundaries inappropriate to creatures of God. What’s more, if Christ is (among so many other things) the most exemplary, but even more the most real, the most true person, and if we confess his sinless obedience to the Father as axiomatic, then to take sin as the primary locus for understanding personhood is to disqualify Christology (and, therefore, anthropology) from the discussion from the start.

The significance of Christ’s resurrected humanity is also maligned when Paul’s description of struggling with sin in Romans 7:14-25 is interpreted as normative Christian experience. Hays considers that the notion of simul justus et peccator can perpetuate this misunderstanding of Romans 7 because it does not adequately reflect Christ’s transformative power. Donald Alexander has observed that many Christians identify with Paul’s description of struggling with sin and interpret it to be normative. Paul writes:

For we know that the law is spiritual; but I am of the flesh, sold into slavery under sin. I do not understand my own actions. For I do not do what I want, but I do the very thing I hate. Now if I do what I do not want, I agree that the law is good. But in fact it is no longer I that do it, but sin that dwells within me. For I know that nothing good dwells within me, that is, in my flesh. I can will what is right, but I cannot do it. For I do not do the good I want, but the evil I do not want is what I do. Now if I do what I do not want, it is no longer I that do it, but sin that dwells within me. So I find it to be a law that when I want to do what is good, evil lies close at hand. For I delight in the law of God in my inmost self, but I see in my members another law at war with the law of my mind, making me captive to the law of sin that dwells in my members. Wretched man that I am!

---

41 Hays, Moral Vision, 44.
42 Matt Jenson, The Gravity of Sin: Augustine, Luther and Barth on homo incurvatus in se (London: T&T Clark, 2007), 189.
43 Ibid.
44 Hays, Moral Vision, 44.
45 Donald Alexander, ‘The Riddle of Sanctification’ in Christian Spirituality: Five Views of Sanctification, happier thinking of ourselves at best as troubled sinners and certainly not as righteous saints.’
Hauerwas, Sanctify Them, 125.
Who will rescue me from this body of death? Thanks be to God through Jesus Christ our Lord! So then, with my mind I am a slave to the law of God, but with my flesh I am a slave to the law of sin. (Rom. 7:14-25)

‘[This speech] is so compelling and so poignant,’ Francis Watson considers, ‘that generations of readers have assumed that Paul must be articulating his present experience as a Christian.’ This has been the typical Reformed perspective. However, it has been challenged by those who believe that Paul is actually recounting his pre-Christian experience and by others who believe that it is not autobiographical but rather a description of life under the law. The crucial question, however, is whether Paul’s description of struggling with sin is supposed to be normative for the Christian.

From the wider context of Romans chapters 6-8, it is evident that, although a struggle with sin may be the experience of a Christian, it is not how a Christian is intended to live. Francis Watson proposes that Romans 7 must be interpreted together with Romans 6 as an ‘antithetically constructed diptych’ which contrasts Christ and law, righteousness and sin. Romans 7 must also be understood together with Romans 8, which shows that the alternative to a life under the law in Romans 7 is a life in the Spirit. Watson argues that this means that Paul is not resigned to a life of struggle; he is showing that ‘the nightmare of self-incomprehension and despair’ can come to an end. Similarly, Hays contends that Romans 6 and 8 testify to humanity’s liberation from the powers of sin. Whilst Rom. 8:17-30 acknowledges the eschatological reserve, Paul’s emphasis is upon God’s present power in the Church. Paul’s exclamation of praise in Rom. 7:25a is not merely a celebration of God’s forgiveness but of God’s liberation from bondage to sin. Therefore Hays asserts, ‘The 47 R. Michael Allen, Reformed Theology (New York: T&T Clark, 2010), 87. For an example of this perspective, see Bavinck, Our Reasonable Faith, 492-93.

---

48 For an example of the interpretation of Rom. 7:14-25 as pre-Christian experience, see C. H. Dodd, The Epistle of Paul to the Romans (New York: Harper & Brothers Publishers, 1932). Dodd argues that the use of ‘I’ refers to Paul himself and the use of the present tense indicates that he is recalling a previous experience. In addition, a corruption of the text displaced verse 25b. For an example of the interpretation of Rom. 7:14-25 as life under the law, see W. G. Kümmel, Romer 7 und die Bekenhrung des Paulus (Leipzig: Hinrichs, 1929). Kümmel argues that the ‘I’ is not autobiographical and points to its rhetorical use elsewhere in Romans and the wider New Testament.
49 Watson, Paul, Judaism and the Gentiles, 277-78.
50 Ibid., 291-92.
51 Hays, Moral Vision, 44.
agonized struggle of Romans 7 is hardly offered by Paul as a normative account of Christian experience.' 52

Paul decisively proclaims the end of our enslavement to sin. As Barth argues, the heart of Paul’s argument in Romans is that we have been liberated from sin. Romans 7:14-25 is useful only insofar as it shows what we have been liberated from. He writes,

...Paul describes the meaning and the action of that law from which by our faith we have in fact be liberated – or rather for which in our faith we ourselves are no longer able. These verses therefore picture a situation which can only interest us as our past situation which is outdated in the faith, a situation in which we did not have the right attitude to sin or to the Law. And Paul’s words about it certainly do not invite us to remain in that situation or to take it seriously. He does not desire to draw our attention to what prevails and happens in the situation from which we have been called away in the faith, but to the fact that we have been called away from it. 53

Noble also points to the wider New Testament witness to argue that sin should not be considered normative. He refers to the gospel of John and the first letter of John, where sin is presented as an exception in the life of the Christian. 54 John asserts, ‘No one who is born of God will continue to sin’ (1 John 3:9). This does not mean that sin is impossible, Noble argues, but that it is a ‘conditional impossibility’: ‘The regenerate Christian cannot commit sin as long as he or she is actively trusting in God through Christ and living in the divine presence.’ 55 Therefore, whilst appreciating the eschatological tension, Noble contends that struggling with sin should not be considered a normative Christian experience. 56

The tendency to conceive of the Church’s identity in terms of forgiven sinners who must struggle with sin is fuelled by an external understanding of the atonement. This is because an external scheme cannot truly transform humanity. We are only forgiven sinners who have a positional righteousness and a second chance to attempt to be good. This throws us back upon our own impossible efforts to struggle with sin and can lead to an attitude of resignation. As Smail considers, the ‘sober estimate’ of the Church as a company of ‘justified sinners’ makes Christ remote, sanctification incomplete, and throws people back

52 Ibid., 38; 44-45.
53 Barth, Romans, 75.
54 Noble, Holy Trinity, 39.
55 Ibid., 82.
56 Ibid., 34.
upon themselves to strive to achieve it instead of participating in Christ’s definitive sanctification on our behalf. Noble observes that an external account of the atonement, whether legal or moral, does not appreciate the ontological transformation involved: ‘It offers no explanation of what Paul meant when he wrote of the cross as a “dying to sin.”’ Noble argues that Christ’s death was the death of sinful Adamic humanity; only by recognising this can humanity truly be sanctified. Otherwise the outworking of sanctification places an ‘enormous weight’ on the individual Christian. According to the Torrances’ scheme of salvation, humanity is ontologically transformed through the vicarious humanity of Christ. Christ became incarnate to be an example of us, not just for us. This means that humanity is truly holy and we are liberated to grow into that reality as we participate in Christ by the Spirit.

Robert Saucy suggests that it is better to describe the Christian as ‘a saint who sins’ rather than as ‘a sinner who is forgiven’. Addressing the language of ‘miserable sinner’ Christianity, Saucy recognises that it is not intended as an end in itself, for as the ‘miserable sinner’ seeks refuge in the grace of God he finds true joy and forgiveness. However, he is concerned that many Christians perceive this to be their fundamental identity. Saucy argues that, although the New Testament witness records the early Christians sinning, it does not describe the early Christians as ‘sinners’. Christians are defined by their identity as ‘saints’ in Christ. Christians are depicted as having a new orientation towards righteousness (1 John 2:29-3:2; Eph. 5:8; 1 Thess. 5:5; 2 Cor. 5:17; Col. 3:9-10). He also 57 Smail, Reflected Glory, 124-27.

58 Noble, Holy Trinity, 145-53.
59 Ibid., 148.
60 Ibid., 152-53.
61 Saucy, ‘Sinners’, 403. Peterson considers, ‘It is one of the tragedies of church history that, in official as well as popular usage, the term ‘saint’ has become too narrowly identified with apostles or outstanding Christian leaders and exemplars. The notion that all Christians are saints by virtue of God’s calling is obscured by this misleading practice. If a particular individual’s sanctity is celebrated, it suggests that personal holiness is in some way a departure from the norm. Worse still, it implies that sainthood is an achievement, not a gift.’ Peterson, Possessed, 41.
62 Saucy, ‘Sinners’, 400-1. Saucy points to Luther’s Short Catechism, Anglican liturgy and the theology of B.B. Warfield.
63 Ibid., 402. See Rom. 1:7; 12:13; 15:25-26,31; 16:2,15; 1 Cor. 1:2; 6:1; 14:33; 16:1,15; 2 Cor. 1:1; 8:4; 9:1,12; 13:13; Eph. 1:1,15,18; 3:8,18; 4:12; 5:3; 6:18; Phil. 1:1; 4:22; Col. 1:2,4,12,26; 1 Thess. 3:13; 2 Thess. 1:10; 1 Tim. 5:10; Philem. 1:5,7; Heb. 6:10; 13:24; Jude 1:1. Cf. Noble, Holy Trinity, 22. Saucy addresses the contention that Paul described himself as ‘the foremost of sinners’ (1 Tim. 1:15-16) by arguing that this was not a definition of his true identity (404-5). This seems correct because Paul is speaking in relation to Jesus’ salvation of sinners, which granted for us a new identity in him as saints. Saucy also addresses Paul’s description of struggling with sin (Rom. 7:14-25) which he argues actually points to the positive identity of the Christian. He argues that the ‘I’ is good but has been overcome by the power of sin (410-11).
64 Saucy, ‘Sinners’, 402.
refers to Paul’s exhortation to moral behaviour on the basis of a new identity in Christ; Saucy argues that this moral behaviour only has a basis if they truly have a new nature. Furthermore, this new nature is greater than the old nature because Paul is confident that they will cultivate a holy life; Saucy writes, ‘The very assumption that Christians should grow demonstrates a belief that the positive dominates over the negative in their being. For a Christian to grow, there must be a stronger inclination toward God than toward sin.’ Thus he argues that it is better to affirm our identity as ‘saints’ rather than ‘sinners’.

In his preaching, T. F. affirmed his congregation’s identity as saints in Christ:

Don’t you see, in God’s sight, you are already secluded in the heart of Jesus Christ, you are already a new creature though to all outward appearances you may be far from it, you are already a saint though you know yourself to be a sinner. That is the glorious paradox of the Gospel.

Similarly, for Barth, although it is not yet fully revealed, sainthood is our new form of existence. He upholds the Reformed language of simul iustus et peccator yet believes that it is important to affirm and celebrate our identity as saints:

We who were once "children of wrath," "dead in trespasses and sins," are saints. We are holy... This is no time for false modesty... Hold your head high! You have dignity. You have worth. Not only have you been created by the gracious and omnipotent hand of God, you have been redeemed in the blood of His Son and sanctified by the power of His Spirit through Word and Sacrament.

Barth cites Martin Luther as having the same attitude:

All of us are saints, and accursed be he who does not call himself a saint and glory in it. If you believe the words of Christ, you are a saint as well as St. Peter and all the other saints; for, depend on it, Christ will not lie to you. Therefore if you do not say: I have as much as St. Peter and am as saintly as St. Peter, then you are ungrateful to your Lord Christ... Nor is such glorying in our sainthood

---

65 Ibid., 403
66 Ibid., 412.
67 Ibid., 403.
69 Barth, Church Dogmatics IV/2, 511; 516-17; 523; 674-75.
arrogance but modesty and thankfulness. In fact, he who does not do it is slandering Christ and Baptism.\textsuperscript{71}

Barth and Luther both raise the contention that affirming our identity as saints is perceived as immodesty or arrogance. However, as Paul wrote, our boast is not in ourselves but in Christ (Rom. 15:17; Gal. 6:14).\textsuperscript{72} Our confidence is not in our own creaturely capacity or possibilities but in Christ. Inherent in the affirmation that God has made us holy in Christ is the recognition of our weakness and sinfulness for it is an acceptance that we cannot achieve sanctification ourselves. T.F. asserts,

\begin{quote}
It is the very fact of the church's holiness in Christ, the reality that in Christ the church is already justified and sanctified for ever, that reminds the church that so long as it lives in this world that passes away, and partakes of its sinful patterns and forms, it is involved in error and wrong. Therefore it lives in such a way that its participation in divine holiness is the condemnation of sin in its flesh; it lives bearing about in its body the dying of the Lord Jesus Christ that the life of Jesus may be manifest even in its mortal flesh; and therefore from day to day and from age to age, until Christ comes again, it must live by putting off the old nature with its corruption and sin, and putting on the new nature with which it is clothed through the baptism of the Spirit uniting it to the risen and glorious body of Jesus Christ.\textsuperscript{73}
\end{quote}

It is a false humility to make sinfulness our primary identity because it is a rejection of what God has done for us in Christ. It most honours God to accept our new nature and clothe ourselves with Christ.\textsuperscript{74} Although we live in the eschatological reserve between Christ's

\textsuperscript{71} Ibid.
\textsuperscript{72} Barth believed that our sainthood does not give rise to boasting: 'We are not saints because we make ourselves such. We are saints and sanctified because we are already sanctified, already saints, in this One.' Barth, \textit{Church Dogmatics}, IV/2, 516-17.
\textsuperscript{73} T.F.T., \textit{Atonement}, 388. Cf. 'The church is not holy because its members are holy or live virtuous lives, but because through his presence in the Holy Spirit Christ continues to hallow himself in the midst of the church, hallowing the church as his body and the body as his church. Thus the true holiness of the members is not different from this but a participation in it, a participation in the holiness of Christ the head of the church and in the holiness of the church as the body hallowed by Christ.' (387).
\textsuperscript{74} Murray suggests that it is God's grace, not our sin, which is the truest basis of our humility: 'Christ's example teaches us that it is not sin that must humble us. This is what many Christians think. They consider daily falls to be necessary in order to remain humble. This is not so. There is indeed a humility that is very lovely, and of such great value as the beginning of something more, which consists in the acknowledgement of transgressions and shortcomings. But, there is a humility which is more heavenly still, and which consists, even when grace keeps us from sinning, in the self-abasement that can only wonder that God should bless us... It is grace we need, and not sin, to make and keep us humble. The heaviest laden branches always bow the lowest.' Murray, \textit{Like Christ}, 149-50. ascension and Parousia, we are determined by the reality of our new ontological identity in Christ’s risen humanity, sharing in Christ’s holiness as saints.

Confidence in Christ

The eschatological orientation of our humanity in Christ offers us a confidence for the ‘now’ which is a necessary corrective to an apathetic and resigned focus on the ‘not yet’. Although humanity lives in the eschatological reserve, in a world of continuing sin and evil, it is neither defined nor ruled by it; we are determined by the risen humanity of Christ. As T.F. asserts,

The Church of the risen Lord has no right to be a prophet of gloom or despair, for this world has been redeemed and sanctified by Christ, and he will not let it go. The corruptible clay of our poor earth has been taken up in Jesus, is consecrated through his sacrifice and resurrection, and he will not allow it to sink back into corruption... The Church must learn to take into its mouth the Good News of the resurrection and new creation, for that must be its primary note, one of limitless joy and thanksgiving.

A fuller appreciation of the significance of this present reality challenges the tendency to conceive of humanity primarily in terms of sinfulness and the resulting resignation to sin as a life-long struggle. It gives us confidence to grow into the reality of who we are in Christ.

Whilst grounded in a realism regarding the eschatological reserve, T.F. displays an intense confidence on account of our new eschatological orientation in Christ. He writes,

The church that is launched into this situation in history is the suffering servant, the church under the cross, and to all outward appearances the weak and 76 A significant contribution of the Wesleyan tradition and the Pentecostal-Charismatic movement has been their optimism regarding holiness. For a discussion of the Wesleyan tradition, see Noble, Holy Trinity, 193. For the Pentecostal-Charismatic movement, see Simon Tugwell, Did You Receive the Spirit? (London: Darton, Longman & Todd, 1972), 83: ‘While we may agree with Brunner that Christianity plus is no longer Christianity, Pentecostalism has come in protest against Christianity minus.’ Pentecostalism has been commended for not being satisfied with lack and for believing that there can be greater actualization of the promises given in the Gospel. See Pinnock, Flame of Love, 170. Cf. Smail, Forgotten Father, 138-42. Some current voices within the Pentecostal-Charismatic movement are appreciative of the Torrance brothers but wish to see in their work a greater confidence in the manifestation of our sanctification. See John Crowder, ‘The Inner Sanctum’, 22.05.12. http://thenewmystics.payperlive.com/archive/view/191483266/May%2022%20-%20Part%201.

---

helpless, the despised and downtrodden church, but it is also the church of the victorious king. The shout of a king is in its midst! A new song is in its mouth, the song of final and complete triumph, a song of indescribable joy and confidence in Jesus Christ.

For T.F., it is the present reality of the new creation in Christ that should consume us: ‘Throughout this the accent must undoubtedly fall upon the triumphant certainty of the finished work of Christ, for Christ is already the new man in whom all things are become new and in whom we have proleptically even now the consummation of the divine purpose of creation.’

However, there is a general lack of discussion of this confidence by the Torrances in relation to the subjective outworking of sanctification. Whilst this is perhaps characteristic of their Reformed tradition, more particularly this may be on account of their focus on Christ’s priesthood as opposed to the other offices of Christ as prophet and king. J.B. perceived a focus in the church upon Christ’s prophetic office that presented Jesus only in terms of bearing God’s word to humankind and neglected his vicarious human response, thereby placing the burden upon humanity. J.B. believed that Christ’s prophetic office needed to be balanced with an understanding of his priestly office, whereby he offers the human response to God on our behalf. He was particularly concerned with the problem of a ‘unitarian’ attitude to worship, which has no concept of Christ’s priestly role as mediator, in whose worthy worship we participate by the Spirit. A unitarian approach places a burden upon the worshipper to offer this worthy worship himself. The Torrances sought to 77 T.F.T., Atonement, 436. Cf. ‘The new creation is as yet a hidden creation, hidden with Christ in God, but always on the point of becoming manifest. Until then the church lives in the eschatological tension between the first coming of the kingdom and the final coming, and carries out her task as the crucified body in the realm where sin and the flesh are still found and where the subordinate powers still try to break free from the lordship of Christ. Nevertheless the church lives in the Spirit on the day of the Lord, that is to say, on the victory side of the kingdom, and the song in her mouth is the triumphant chant of Psalm 3, ‘Why do the nations conspire, and the peoples plots in vain?... I have set my king on Zion, my holy hill... Ask of me, and I will make the nations your heritage, and the ends of the earth your possession.’ T.F.T., Atonement, 409. Cf. ‘In spite of being in the likeness of sinful flesh the new community is indeed the body of Christ...’. T.F.T., Atonement, 405.

---

79 See J.B.T., Worship, 59-60. For further discussion upon this, see chapter four. J.B. considered that, if the Holy Spirit inspired Jesus’ actions, and we now have the same Holy Spirit, we can have confidence in being like Christ. See J.B.T., ‘The Priesthood of Jesus’, 163. Davidson and Habets criticise T.F. for not offering a more comprehensive pneumatology (see chapter 3). Perhaps further exploration of the Spirit would have yielded a greater confidence in the subjective outworking of our sanctification.

81 J.B.T, Worship, 7-18.
emphasise Christ’s priestly office in order to counteract attitudes that bypassed his vicarious and mediatorial role and therefore threw people back upon themselves.\textsuperscript{82}

Christ’s priestly office is indispensable for understanding the subjective outworking of sanctification. Jesus’ sanctification of humanity by offering the perfect human response to God in our place liberates us from endeavours to attain sanctification ourselves. However, Christ’s kingly office is also necessary for understanding the subjective outworking of sanctification. Furthermore, it would contribute to the Torrances’ determination to counteract attitudes that throw people back upon themselves. Noble argues that Christ’s kingly office expresses his victory over evil and the death of old sinful Adamic humanity and therefore must not be overlooked when considering sanctification.\textsuperscript{83} Whilst T.F. recognises Christ’s kingly office, there is rather little positive discussion of what this means for humanity in the outworking of sanctification.\textsuperscript{84}

The death of sinful humanity and Christ’s victory over evil offers us confidence in the nature of our new humanity and the outworking of our sanctification. Paul declares that our inclusion in Christ’s death and resurrection has set us free from sin:

\begin{quote}
How can we who died to sin go on living in it? Do you not know that all of us who have been baptised into Christ Jesus were baptised into his death? Therefore we have been buried with him by baptism into death, so that, just as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, so we too might walk in newness of life. For if we have been united with him in a death like his, we will certainly be united with him in a resurrection like his. We know that our old self was crucified with him so that the body of sin might be destroyed, and we might no longer be enslaved to sin. For whoever has died is free from sin. But if we have
\end{quote}

\textsuperscript{82} MacLean observes that T.F. refers to Christ’s kingly office as his ‘Royal Priesthood’, which is indicative of his emphasis on Christ’s priestly office. MacLean, \textit{Resurrection, Apocalypse and the Kingdom}, 18.

\textsuperscript{83} Noble, \textit{Holy Trinity}, 149; 140. Noble points to Wesley and Irenaeus as examples of those who appreciate Christ’s victory over the power of sin (139). Noble seeks to uphold each of Christ’s offices. His priestly office is indispensable for expressing that the atonement was not a mere external transaction, but effected an ontological transformation through Christ’s vicarious humanity (143-48). His kingly office expresses Christ’s victory over evil and the death of old sinful Adamic humanity (149). His prophetic office reveals the heart of God on the cross and calls for our response in the freedom of what has already been achieved (150-55).

\textsuperscript{84} T.F.T., \textit{School of Faith}, civ. It is notable that in T.F.’s exploration of the nature of Christ’s ascension as Prophet, Priest and King, it is Christ as Prophet and Priest that receives a lengthy discussion including the implications for humanity. T.F.’s discussion of Christ as King focuses on Jesus without recourse to the implications for humanity sharing in his victory. When he writes that the ascension means the exaltation of the new man, he is careful to qualify this with the danger of vertigo. See T.F.T., \textit{Atonement}, 270-95.
died with Christ, we believe that we will also live with him. We know that Christ, being raised from the dead, will never die again; death no longer has dominion over him. The death he died, he died to sin, once for all, but the life he lives, he lives to God. So you also must consider yourselves dead to sin and alive to God in Christ Jesus. Therefore, do not let sin exercise dominion in your mortal bodies, to make you obey their passions. No longer present your members to sin as instruments of wickedness, but present yourselves to God as those who have been brought from death to life, and present your members to God as instruments of righteousness. For sin will have no dominion over you, since you are not under law but under grace (Rom. 6:2-14).

Although in one sense the ascension means the removal of Christ from the world, in another sense it means that humanity is raised up and seated in heavenly places in Christ. When Christ’s ascension is only understood in terms of his withdrawal from humanity, we are thrown back upon ourselves in the task of sanctification. As Smail considers:

The ascension of Christ can be seen as his withdrawal into heavenly glory, with all his work ended, so that the burden of his cause and mission falls upon the human shoulders of his people. The way is thus opened for the activity emphasis of so much Protestantism, the pressure of all that we have to do for him, of his dependence upon us, and of our responsibility to bring in his kingdom for him.

Yet the ascension also means that we are raised up with Christ and share in his victory over sin (Eph. 1:17-21).

Whilst a typically Reformed perspective tends to conceive of the outworking of sanctification as a life-long struggle, Christ’s kingly office indicates that we are seated in a

---

85 Cf. The first letter of John also points to the possibility of the Christian not sinning: ‘I am writing these things to you so that you may not sin’ (1 Jn. 2:1); ‘No one who abides in [Christ] keeps on sinning’ (2:8); ‘Everyone born of God does not keep on sinning’ (5:18). Paul writes of God’s intention that we live holy lives: ‘For this is the will of God, your sanctification: that you abstain from sexual immorality; that each one of you know how to control his own body in holiness and honour... God has not called us for impurity, but in holiness’ (1 Thess. 4:3-4, 7). Moreover, there is a clear Biblical imperative to live holy lives. 1 Peter 1:15-16 exhorts, ‘But just as he who called you in holy, so be holy in all you do; for it is written: “Be holy, because I am holy.”’ Paul writes, ‘I urge you, brothers and sisters, in view of God’s mercy, to offer your bodies as a living sacrifice, holy and pleasing to God – this is your true and proper worship’ (Rom. 12:1). The Biblical witness thus points to the possibility of the Christian living without sin.

86 This offers a theological basis for Pentecostal-Charismatic mystical experience of encountering God in the heavenly throne room.

87 Smail, Reflected Glory, 127.
place of victory and rest.  Although the eschatological tension of Christ’s awaited Parousia explains why it is still possible for a Christian to experience a struggle with sin, it does not make this an inevitable experience. The tension that Paul describes between the Spirit and the flesh does not necessarily entail struggle (Gal. 5:17). He contrasts sinful behaviour (Gal. 5:19-21) with the ‘fruit of the Spirit’ (5:22-23). This suggests that holy behaviour is something that the Spirit produces in us, rather than something that we can attain through our own struggles. Jesus proclaimed, “I am the vine; you are the branches. If a man remains in me and I in him, he will bear much fruit; apart from me you can do nothing” (John 15:5). Murray takes this metaphor further, arguing, ‘The vine has to do the work, and the branch enjoys the fruit of it.’ The outworking of sanctification is not a struggle; it comes from a place of rest. This metaphor of the vine and the branches and the language of abiding in Christ also expresses the ontological nature of humanity’s relationship to Christ. When sanctification is conceived of in external, logico-causal categories of endeavouring to follow Jesus’ example, it becomes a life-long struggle to battle with the sinful nature. This is an impossible task and the very reason for Christ’s vicariously taking sin upon himself in order to destroy it. Such a perspective detracts from what has been accomplished for us in the vicarious humanity of Christ. When the outworking of sanctification is conceived of in terms of participating by the Spirit in Christ, and therefore from a place of rest in what Christ has already accomplished, the Christian life does not have to be a struggle. As T.F. writes, 88 E.g. Bavinck describes the life of the Christian as ‘a continuous struggle’. Bavinck, Our Reasonable Faith, 492.

89 Cf. Jesus ‘has gone into heaven and is at the right hand of God, with angels, authorities, and powers having been subjected to him’ (1 Peter 3:21-22).
90 Cf. T.F.T., Atonement, 387. Cf. Louis Berkhof: ‘Some have the mistaken notion that sanctification consists merely in the drawing out of the new life, implanted in the soul by regeneration, in a persuasive way by presenting motives to the will. But this is not true... Scripture clearly exhibits the supernatural character of sanctification in several ways. It describes it as a work of God, 1 Thess. 5:23; Heb. 13:20,21, as a fruit of the union of life with Jesus Christ, John 15:4, Gal. 2:20; 4:19, as a work that is wrought in man from within and which for that very reason cannot be a work of man, Eph. 3:16: Col. 1:11, and speaks of its manifestation in Christian virtues as the work of the Spirit, Gal. 5:22. It should never be represented as a merely natural process in the spiritual development of man, nor brought down to the level of a mere human achievement, as is done in a great deal of modern liberal theology.’ Louis Berkhof, Systematic Theology (London: Banner of Truth Trust, 1988), 532-3.
91 Murray, Absolute Surrender, 113.
92 Cf. Jesus proclaimed, “Come to me, all you who are weary and burdened, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you and learn from me, for I am gentle and humble in heart, and you will find rest for your souls. For my yoke is easy and my burden is light” (Matt. 11:28-30). This rest is also echoed in Hebrews 4:1: ‘Therefore, since the promise of entering his rest still stands, let us be careful that none of you be found to have fallen short.’
By the death of Christ, Christ comes to dwell in me. Instead therefore of living a life of incessant struggle (Rom 7) against an external law, the Living Christ takes up His abode in the heart and becomes the fountain of all actions, the prime motivation of all deeds and thoughts. The Righteousness of God results as a spontaneous outflow radiating from the indwelling Christ.

This confidence in the nature of our new humanity and the outworking of sanctification may be deemed triumphalism. Yet it must be emphasised again that this confidence is a boast in God, not our own human efforts, as Paul was proud to do (Gal. 6:14; Rom. 15:17; 2 Cor. 12:9-10). It is confidence in God’s victory rather than resignation to powerlessness that surely most glorifies God. This confidence reflects the triumphal tone of the Biblical witness (Rom. 6:14; 8:31; 1 Cor. 15:57; 2 Cor. 4:8; Eph. 6:10-13; Phil. 4:13; Col. 2:15; Jas. 4:7; 1 Pet. 2:9; 1 Jn. 5:4). Christ’s resurrection power is greater than the sin that held sway over our old human nature. As Paul proclaimed, although all die in Adam, so in Christ all are made alive (1 Cor. 15:22). Christ’s victory is greater than the powers of evil so that as co-heirs with Christ (Gal. 4:7) we are described as ‘more than conquerors’ (Rom. 8:37) and God leads us in ‘triumphal procession in Christ’ (2 Cor. 2:14).

In seeking to do justice to the eschatological tension, Smail argues that the balance must not be so tipped towards the ‘now’ that the eschatological reserve is disregarded. It is the talent of T.F. that he remains a realist about the eschatological reserve. His confidence is not a denial of this eschatological tension and therefore cannot be deemed triumphalism. Yet, as Smail considers, if the balance is tipped towards the ‘not yet’, Christ is made remote and we are thrown back upon our own efforts, instead of participating in Christ. The Torrances’ scheme of salvation corrects a poor perspective on humanity and a powerless resignation to sin. Our new eschatological orientation in Christ gives us confidence in the 94 Triumphalism is a common charge against the Pentecostal-Charismatic movement. E.g. D. Neil Hudson, ‘Worship: Singing a New Song in a Strange Land’ in Pentecostal Perspectives ed. Keith Warrington (Carlisle: Paternoster Press, 1998), 196. MacLean criticises T.F.’s early eschatology, as expressed in his sermons, for being ‘somewhat triumphalistic’. MacLean, Resurrection, Apocalypse and the Kingdom, 35. In T.F.’s sermon on John 14:19, he preaches about how Christ’s resurrection life can be a ‘present power in the believer’ and that it is not necessary ‘to wait for a great change at the end of life’ (31-33). For MacLean, T.F.’s eschatology matures as it becomes more muted by recourse to the eschatological reserve (38-39). However, first, it is difficult to assert that T.F.’s eschatology has matured from the basis of his sermons. Sermons are not systematic theologies and entail emphases relevant to specific circumstances. Second, T.F.’s optimism should not be criticised as triumphalism; his attitude is a faithful reflection of Biblical optimism.

---

95 Smail, Reflected Glory, 124 -25.
96 Ibid.
nature of our humanity and the outworking of our sanctification. Although there is an eschatological reserve and our holiness will not be fully manifest until the Parousia, we can take pleasure in the process of becoming who we are.

Conclusion

The eschatological reserve created by Jesus’ ascension means that, although humanity has been made definitively holy, this truth is partly hidden and not fully manifest. This defies a realised eschatology or teleology; sinfulness is a continuing presence as we await the full manifestation of our sanctification at the Parousia. Nevertheless, although hidden, it is a definitive reality, which means that the outworking of sanctification is not an external process of becoming progressively more holy. It does not depend upon our own endeavours because there is nothing that we can do to make ourselves any more holy. The outworking of sanctification is the process of the unveiling of the reality of our sanctification in Christ. This is not a denial of our subjective human activity but rather puts it in its proper place, coming from a place of rest in what Christ has already accomplished.

Although we live in the eschatological reserve between the ascension and Parousia, partaking of the corruption of the world, we have been given a new eschatological orientation in the risen humanity of Christ. We are able to share by the Spirit in the new risen humanity of Christ here and now. T.F. follows his Reformed tradition in holding to Luther’s conviction that the believer is simul justus et peccator. Yet it is justus that is our primary reality in Christ and which describes the eschatological orientation of humanity. To make peccator our primary, ontological reality is to dispense with Christ. Although struggling with sin may be the experience of a Christian, it is not how a Christian is intended to live. The tendency to conceive of the Church’s identity in terms of forgiven sinners who must struggle with sin is fuelled by an external understanding of the atonement. This is because an external scheme cannot truly transform humanity. Yet humanity is ontologically transformed through the vicarious humanity of Christ. This means that humanity is truly holy and that we are liberated thereby to grow into that reality as we participate in Christ by the Spirit. It is important to affirm the reality of our identity as saints in Christ. This is not immodesty or arrogance because inherent within this affirmation is the recognition of our weakness and the acceptance that we cannot sanctify ourselves. Our boast is not in ourselves but in Christ and it most honours God to accept our new nature and clothe ourselves with Christ.

A fuller appreciation of the significance of this present reality challenges the tendency to conceive of humanity primarily in terms of sinfulness, and the resulting resignation to sin as a life-long struggle. Whilst T.F. displays an intense confidence on account of our new eschatological orientation in Christ, there is little positive discussion of what this means for humanity in the outworking of sanctification. This is perhaps due to the concern of the Torrances to emphasise Christ’s priestly office in order to counteract attitudes that throw people back upon themselves. Yet a deeper exploration of Christ’s kingly office would further this concern for it declares that we are seated in a place of victory and rest. Although in one sense the ascension means the removal of Christ from the world, in another sense it means that humanity is raised up and seated in heavenly places in Christ. Therefore, although humanity lives in the eschatological reserve, in a world of continuing sin and evil, it is neither defined nor ruled by it. We have confidence to grow into the reality of who we are in Christ. When the outworking of sanctification is conceived of in terms of participating in Christ, and therefore from a place of rest in what Christ has already accomplished, the Christian life does not have to be a struggle. This confidence cannot be deemed triumphalism for it is grounded in a realism regarding the eschatological tension, reflects the triumphal tone of the Biblical witness and gives the glory to God. The final chapter goes on to explore the nature of sin as we live in the eschatological reserve and the liberating and transforming implications of finding our lives out of ourselves in relationship with the triune God of grace.
The eschatological reserve created by Christ’s ascension means the abiding presence of sin in the world, and this chapter seeks to explore further the nature of sin as we await the Parousia. Yet the risen humanity of Christ also gives us a new eschatological orientation and therefore this chapter explores further what this means for us as we seek to live holy lives today. For the Torrances, our new eschatological orientation in Christ means that we are given to share by the Spirit in Christ’s communion with the Father. Here we find that a holy life does not stem from attempting to follow moral rules and regulations, but from our free participation by the Spirit in Christ’s intimate relationship with the Father.

Sin is essentially homo incurvatus in se (man turned in upon himself). It is the unfathomable rejection of God, seeking the place of God for oneself. It is driven by a misunderstanding of God and of our own human nature and, ultimately, arises from not knowing what has objectively been achieved for us in Christ. Thus it expresses itself in the tragic endeavour to gain what we have already been given.

Yet the Holy Spirit is shared by Christ with us so that we might be turned out of ourselves (homo excurvatus ex se) to share in the life of Christ. When we are re-orientated by the Spirit to find our lives in Christ, this is the basis of a holy life. Scripture exhorts us to fix our eyes upon Jesus, which is the true meaning of repentance. God’s purposes for humanity are filial over federal; we were reconciled for relationship, not to have a second chance at adhering to the law. As we share by the Spirit in the Son’s communion with the Father, we grow to reflect the reality of who we are in Christ.

Incurvatus In Se

The eschatological reserve created by Jesus’ ascension means the abiding presence of sin in the world. Although God has chosen to unite humanity to Himself in Christ by the Spirit, there is a mysterious absurdity that some nevertheless reject God:

Sin is utter separation from God, alienation from God— but the distance between God and man is not constituted by any metaphysical magnitude such as the infinite distance between the creator and the creature. The distance between God and man is due precisely to the nearness of God to man, to the antagonism between God’s holy will of love and our sin. The nearer God comes, the more intense the conflict and we are forced to cry, ‘Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord’ and ‘I am not worthy to have you come under my roof.’ Those were words spoken to God incarnate as he came near in Jesus Christ, spoken in the very presence of God, and they bring out into sharp relief the difference, the conflict between humanity and God which is minimised when God is thought of at a distance. Sin presupposes the nearness of God.

A person’s rejection of God is only possible in His presence. For T.F., sin is intrinsically relational: ‘...sin is a personal act against the very person of God.’

---

1 A discussion of the irrational nature of sin can be found in chapter one. Cf. David Kelsey conceives of sin according to Wisdom Literature’s presentation of sin as folly and argues that to attempt to explain it is a conceptual mistake. See David Kelsey, Eccentric Existence: A Theological Anthropology: Volume 1 (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 2009), 408-11. He writes, ‘Sin is a type of negative mystery. It is not mystery in the sense of something in principle explicable but about which we presently have insufficient information for an explanation. Nor is it mystery in the sense of something too richly complex for our finite minds to be able to grasp its rationale. Rather it is a mystery in the sense of something undeniably real but a-rational, without cause or reason. Hence, to pose the question, “How do you explain the presence of sin and evil in the created realm?” is to fall prey to a conceptual mistake.’ (411)

3 Ibid., 252. He writes, ‘Sin is only possible in the presence of God, in the relation of the creature to the creator.’

4 Ibid. Cf. Jüngel: ‘...we must locate sin, we must give it its true place. This place is the relationship to God.’ Jüngel, Justification, 93. Cf. Kelsey describes sin as ‘a distortion of proper human response to God’, which is a relational understanding of sin rather than a failure to fulfil, or the breaking of, rules. Kelsey, Eccentric Existence, 402.
Sin is repudiated fellowship with God within mankind's existential relation to God. It is the act which seizes upon that very relation which they have in fellowship with God, the relation which constitutes the very being of humanity, and perverts it into its opposite, into separation from God, rebellion against him, in the will to be independent and autonomous.\(^5\)

In rejecting God, a person is seeking the place of God for himself or herself: ‘When men and women assert themselves against the Godness of God they are actually asserting themselves to be God, and so placing themselves in direct contradiction to the Godness of God.’\(^6\) As Barth considers, although God intended mankind to participate in His lordship, man seeks to exalt himself autonomously.\(^7\) Man seeks to take the role of judge from Christ and to be his own judge.\(^8\) He seeks to be self-governing, as Adam did in the Garden of Eden.\(^9\) In so doing, he self-destructively alienates himself from God.\(^10\) Barth conceives of man's exaltation of himself to the place of God as the essence of sin.\(^11\)

Barth's understanding of sin complements the Torrances' theology. For Barth, sin is driven by two errors: a misunderstanding of humanity as self-determining and, even more decisively, a misunderstanding of God either as remote or as a despotic ruler.\(^12\) Here we come back again to the importance of the self-revelation of God in Christ that, in the words of J.B., ‘God is a covenant God not a contract God’, and T.F.’s assertion that ‘there is no God behind the back of Jesus’.\(^13\) Furthermore, Christ not only shows us the nature of God, but the nature of humanity. We are determined by the eschatological orientation of the risen humanity of Christ. This may mean that we are not self-determined individuals, but it does

---

\(^6\) Ibid., 249.
\(^7\) Karl Barth, Church Dogmatics IV/1, ed. G. W. Bromiley and T. F. Torrance (Edinburgh: T&T Clark, 1956), 435-36.
\(^8\) Ibid., 445.
\(^9\) Ibid., 420-21.
\(^10\) Ibid., 432; 35-6. T.F. also saw this as self-destructive: ‘Sin is to be understood as the contradiction introduced into this life-relation or life-unity of man with the creator, for in sin the human creature who depends on the creator for existence and life rebels against the creator. Sin is therefore destructive of the creature – a form of suicide. By rebelling against the creator and by asserting his or her independence, the creature is rebelling against the innermost relation which constitutes their very being as a creature, as human being. Sin is therefore an ‘impossible possibility’, as the medieval schoolmen sometimes called it.’ T.F.T., Incarnation, 247-48.
\(^11\) Barth, Church Dogmatics IV/1, 418-19. Jesus acts in obverse to man's self-exaltation by humbling himself in his assumption of humanity (432). Essentially, man 'wants to be his own god and lord and judge'. (459)
\(^12\) Ibid., 463; 465-67. In seeking to be his own judge, man is delusional. For Barth, sin is driven by falsehood (459).
radically liberate us to be ‘personalised persons’ and ‘humanised humans’ who are given to share by the Spirit in Christ’s intimate relationship with the Father.\textsuperscript{14}

This ultimately means that sin is driven by not knowing what has been objectively achieved for us in Christ. In a sermon on Colossians 3:3, T.F. preaches that we behave as though we are not dead to sin because we do not believe that we are dead to sin: ‘That is one of the strange things about men and women. Although Christ has died for them, and they are dead to their old selves, they refuse to believe it; and act as though they were not dead!’\textsuperscript{15} As 2 Peter 1:9 suggests, those who are not practising godliness have forgotten that they have been cleansed from sin.\textsuperscript{16} Similarly, Murray believes that we continue to sin when we do not realise that it has been conquered.\textsuperscript{17} He proposes that this problem is linked to an external understanding of the atonement: some Christians know that Christ died for sin, but they do not realise that he died to sin.\textsuperscript{18}

Sin is driven by the fear of a perceived lack and expresses itself in the attempt to gain what we believe that we do not have. Barth considers that sin is motivated by the attempt to get that which we do not realise we have already been given:

Why is all that we can do, our effective progress, only an ascent or descent from one Titanism to another? Why are we so strikingly the same in spite of all the changes in costume and scenery throughout the centuries? Obviously because the fault lies much deeper. Because the goal of all these strivings is the thing which is an illusion. Because the compelling force behind all these strivings is the false idea that—if only we can acquire this or that—we will succeed in being our own helper and redeemer and saviour.\textsuperscript{19}

T.F. saw this striving to acquire salvation as the most terrible expression of sin: ‘The more they strive in their self-will to save themselves, the more they sin – in fact that is the very movement of sin at its subtlest and in its very worst form, self-justification.’\textsuperscript{20} Eberhard Jüngel also perceives how the falsehood associated with sin leads to legalistic striving: ‘The

\textsuperscript{14} T.F.T., Mediation, 78-79.
\textsuperscript{15} T.F.T., ‘Colossians 3:3’, Sermon to Alyth Parish in 1940 and Beechgrove Parish in 1948, The Thomas F. Torrance Manuscript Collection, Princeton Theological Seminary, Box 47, 3.
\textsuperscript{16} Cf. Paul’s words, ‘Do you not know that you are God’s temple and that God’s Spirit dwells in you?’ (1 Cor. 3:16) and, ‘Do you not know that your body is a temple of the Holy Spirit within you...?’ (6:19), which suggest that we experience sin because we do not know the truth of God.
\textsuperscript{17} Murray, Abide, 128.
\textsuperscript{18} Murray, Like Christ, 155-58.
\textsuperscript{19} Barth, Church Dogmatics IV/1, 461.
\textsuperscript{20} T.F.T., Incarnation, 253.
untruth of sin places the unconditional nature of the gospel under the condition of the law and thus makes the good news into a new morality.\(^21\)

Essentially, sin is homo incurvatus in se (man turned in upon himself).\(^22\) Although we have been reconciled for relationship, to share by the Spirit in the Son’s communion with the Father, there is an irrational mystery that people choose to make themselves their own centre. T.F. writes, ‘The central point in every human being is their relation to God, and sin means that this central point has been violated. Sin means that men and women have fallen out of the central thing in their life and existence, that they have thus become ec- centric...’.\(^23\) Barth describes this as ‘man rotating about himself’.\(^24\) The varieties of sin, such as pride, sloth and falsehood, essentially fall under the one conceptual umbrella of homo incurvatus in se.\(^25\)

Excurvatus Ex Se

Although we live in the eschatological reserve, with the continuing presence of sin, we also live in the power of Pentecost. At Pentecost, Jesus shared the Holy Spirit with humanity so that humanity might share by the Holy Spirit in Christ.\(^26\) The role of the Holy Spirit is to turn us out of ourselves to participate in the life of Christ.\(^27\) T.F. writes that the church finds its true centre of existence in Christ:

The church is the community of the reconciled, redeemed through the blood of Christ, for in him God has abolished the enmity and sin that estranged us from him and has given us the Spirit of true love. Through union with Jesus Christ the \(^{21}\) Jüngel, Justification, 110. He writes, ‘...the epitome of evil is sin in its basic form of the lie... Instead of ‘take and eat’ it says ‘first perform, then you eat’. The untruth of sin places the unconditional nature of the gospel under the condition of the law and thus makes the good news into a new morality.’

\(^{22}\) Jenson traces the notion of incurvatus in se from Augustine to Luther to contemporary theologians. See Jenson, Gravity of Sin.

\(^{26}\) T.F.T., Reconstruction 241. This is what T.F. believes is expressed by the concept of theosis. Theosis is not the deification of the believer but the inclusion of the believer in the divine life, whereby he finds his true centre of existence not in himself but in God (243).

\(^{27}\) Ibid., 238.
church shares in his life and in all that he has done for mankind. Through his birth its members have a new birth and are made members of the new humanity. Through his obedient life and death their sins are forgiven and they are clothed with a new righteousness. Through his resurrection and triumph over the powers of darkness they are freed from the dominion of evil and are made one body with him. Through his ascension the kingdom of heaven is opened to all believers and the church waits for his coming again to fulfil in all humanity the new creation which he has already begun in it. Thus the church finds its life and being not in itself but in Jesus Christ alone, for not only is he the head of the church but he includes the church within his own fullness.

T.F. perceives this truth to be reflected in Paul’s language of the church as the ‘body of Christ’ (Rom. 12:4-5; 1 Cor. 12:12-27; Eph. 1:22-23; 5:29-32; Col. 1:18):

The term body of Christ directs us at once to Christ himself, laying the emphasis not on the body but on Christ. Thus it does not focus attention on the church as an entity in itself or as something that exists for its own sake, but upon the church as the immediate property of Christ which he has made his very own and gathered into the most intimate relation with himself.

T.F. considers the church to be ‘constantly directed away from itself to find in Christ alone its justification and its sanctification.’ As J.B. asserts, ‘In faith we look primarily away from ourselves to Jesus Christ, desiring to be found ‘in him’, clothed with his righteousness (Phil. 3:7-11).’ The essential theme of Paul’s letters to the Corinthians, and in the Epistle to the Hebrews, J.B. argues, is that Christ is our living centre, upon whom we must keep our eyes fixed:

...we need to remind ourselves constantly that the centre of the church is not ourselves, but Jesus Christ our living Lord. Under the pressures of our culture, and of theological controversy, are we not in danger of losing that living centre – of forgetting that the real agent in the life of the Church is not ourselves, but Jesus Christ?

---

28 T.F.T., Atonement, 361.
29 Ibid., 363.
30 Ibid., 371.
31 J.B.T., Worship, 23.
Transformed by the Renewing of the Mind

When we turn away from ourselves (homo incurvatus in se) to Christ (homo excurvatus ex se), this is the essence of repentance. The Greek word metanoia, translated in English as ‘repentance’, essentially means ‘a change of mind’. J.B. therefore describes repentance as a ‘joyful’ activity. It is not an anthropocentric activity whereby we are turned in on ourselves to examine our sinfulness and endeavour to offer satisfactory grief. Rather, repentance is a turning away from ourselves to Christ, in whose intimate communion with the Father we may freely participate.

As we live in the eschatological reserve, the Church is directed away from itself to turn to Christ and hold to what is true of our lives in Christ: ‘So if you have been raised with Christ, seek the things that are above, where Christ is, seated at the right hand of God. Set your minds on things that are above, not on things that are on earth, for you have died, and your life is hidden with Christ in God’ (Col. 3:1-3). Thus T.F. asserts, ‘...while in the new time we are complete in Christ Jesus, yet in the conflicts and abstractions of fallen time we are unable to realise that wholeness, but must nevertheless reckon that we are dead to the old life and created again in the new.’ Not only are we directed to Christ, but we are directed to share in Christ, and in his very mind and truth (1 Cor. 2:16). T.F. urges the church to ‘let the mind that was in Christ be its mind, in order that the whole understanding of the church may be transformed and renewed in him, and in order that the whole structure of its thought may be determined by his truth.’

This means that our beliefs should be shaped by the truth of God rather than our own human experience. In the context of sanctification, this means that what we believe

---

33 T.F.T., Atonement, 3.
34 J.B.T., ‘Christ in our place’, 50.
36 Cf. Although there is a tension between the Spirit and the flesh, we are directed by the Spirit away from ourselves to ‘set [our] minds on the things of the Spirit’ (Rom. 8:5). Cf. ‘So we fix our eyes not on what is seen, but on what is unseen. For what is seen is temporary, but what is unseen is eternal.’ (2 Cor. 4:18); ‘...fixing our eyes on Jesus, the author and perfector of faith...’ (Heb. 12:2).
should be formed by the truth of our identity as saints in Christ, as opposed to our earthly experiences of sinfulness. Paul often exhorts the early Christians to turn from their experience of sin to God and His truth. He writes to the Galatians, ‘Formerly, when you did not know God, you were enslaved to beings that by nature are not gods. Now, however, that you have come to know God, or rather to be known by God, how can you turn back again to the weak and beggarly elemental spirits? How can you want to be enslaved to them again?’ (Gal. 4:8-9). In the context of the Corinthians’ jealousy and quarrelling, Paul writes, ‘Do you not know that you are God’s temple and that God’s Spirit dwells in you? If anyone destroys God’s temple, God will destroy that person. For God’s temple is holy, and you are that temple’ (1 Cor. 3:16-17). Shortly afterwards, in the context of their fighting and sexual immorality, he writes similarly, ‘Do you not know that your body is a temple of the Holy Spirit within you, which you have from God, and that you are not your own?’ (1 Cor. 6:19).

Barth considers that Paul’s method of moral instruction is to remind the early Christians of what has already been accomplished in Christ: ‘To oppose the raging flood of human vice a barrier by which it is set effectively in the past all that is needed is the ἀλλὰ of recollection of what has taken place in Jesus Christ, and in Him for them and to them.’ Since sin is driven by a misunderstanding of God and of humanity, it is necessary to have correct knowledge in order to lead holy lives. As Hays argues,

Insofar as we perceive the truth about God’s redemptive work in the world, we will participate gladly in the outworking of God’s purpose; conversely, if we fail to act in a way consonant with God’s will, we are living in a state of contradiction: we are failing to understand what is going on about us. Consequently, much of Paul’s moral exhortation takes the form of reminding his 39 Barth, Church Dogmatics IV/2, 517. Here Barth is commenting on 1 Cor. 6:11.

40 ‘The preparation (καταρτισμός) of the saints consists in the recollection, first of what Christ already is, that as the Head of all things He is their Head, and second of what they already are in Him, that as the community they are His body, summoned to hasten towards this being of His and theirs, and therefore to that ἐνότης. This is the truth by which they are determined, and it is absolutely superior to every sleight of men “method of error” (v. 15). The preparation of the saints consists in their equipment for ἀληθεύειν, i.e., for a life which here and now is lived by and for this truth; in a love for their Head which will not fail to give inner unity to the Church. Ἀληθεύοντες ἐν ἐγκύπτειν in virtue of this preparation, the saints will do the ἐργον τῆς διακονίας (v. 12) and therefore fulfil the meaning of their existence as saints. They will “grow” (a concept to which we shall have to return in the second sub-section), i.e., grow εἰς κύριόν, into Christ who is their Head, in the direction which He thus gives, and towards the goal which He thus appoints.’ Barth, Church Dogmatics IV/2, 626. Here Barth is exegeting Eph. 4: 12-15.
readers to view their obligations and actions in the cosmic context of what God has done in Christ.\textsuperscript{41}

Murray asserts, 'The whole Christian life depends on the clear consciousness of our position in Christ.'\textsuperscript{42} He writes,

Get hold of your union to Christ; believe in the new nature within you, that spiritual life which you have from Christ, a life that has died and been raised again. A man’s acts are always in accordance with his idea of his state. A king acts like a king, otherwise we say, “That man has forgotten his kingship,” but if a man is conscious of being a king, he behaves like a king. And so I cannot live the life of a true believer unless I am filled with a consciousness of this every day... As long as I do not know it, I cannot act according to it, though it be in me... know yourselves as dead indeed unto sin.\textsuperscript{43}

It may not always necessarily follow that we lead holy lives when we recognise our identity in Christ; the irrational nature of sin prevents a definite logico-causal connection. Nevertheless, the idea that our perceived identity is significant for how we behave is supported by Paul’s frequent affirmation of our identity in Christ, followed by an exhortation to live according to this new identity. For example, in Romans 6, Paul explains that we have been crucified with Christ and have risen with him to new life. He goes on to encourage the Romans to focus on their new identity in Christ: ‘So you also must consider yourselves dead to sin and alive to God in Christ Jesus’ (Rom. 6:11). Then he exorts them to live righteously (6:12-13). In the same way, Paul tells the Colossians that they have died with Christ (Col. 3:2), and this is followed by the exhortation to put to death their sinful behaviour (3:5-9). Paul reminds the Colossians of their identity as ‘God’s chosen ones, holy and beloved’ and exhorts them to holy living (3:12ff.). In his letter to the Ephesians, Paul encourages them to live no longer according to the old nature as the Gentiles do but to grow up into Christ (Eph. 4:1,15,17), reminding them that they are ‘created according to the likeness of God in true righteousness and holiness’ (4:24). He instructs the Ephesians to live in the likeness of Christ (5:1-2) and to avoid impurity ‘as is proper among saints’ (5:3). Paul’s pattern of affirmation of our identity followed by exhortation to live accordingly is also echoed in the first letter of Peter which affirms, ‘You are a chosen people, a royal priesthood, a holy nation...’ (1 Pet. 2:9) and then goes on in exhortation to abstain from sin and live holy lives (2:11-12ff.).

\textsuperscript{41} Hays, \textit{Moral Vision}, 39.
\textsuperscript{42} Murray, \textit{Abide}, 51.
\textsuperscript{43} Murray, \textit{The Master’s Indwelling}, 71.
Scriptural exhortations to Godly behaviour are often preceded by directing the early Christians to the truth of their identity in Christ.

T.F.’s preaching reflects this Biblical pattern. In a sermon on Romans 6, T.F. preached that the new life we have as a result of our inclusion in Christ’s vicarious humanity leads to a change in moral behaviour. He encouraged his congregation to live knowing that they are dead to sin and alive to God, believing this to be the basis of living free from sin. Similarly, in a sermon on Philippians 2:12, T.F. affirmed his congregation’s identity as saints in Christ and spoke of this as the basis of a holy life:

Don’t you see, in God’s sight, you are already secluded in the heart of Jesus Christ, you are already a new creature though to all outward appearances you may be far from it, you are already a saint though you know yourself to be a sinner. That is the glorious paradox of the Gospel. Christ has been tempted in all points as we are, He has tasted death for every man, and now presents us with a perfect redemption – and it is only because He has done that, that we may pluck up our courage and work, for it is God that worketh in us.

Hauerwas regrets that modern Christian ethics has forgotten this orientation towards God and His truth, instead becoming self-centred and focused upon what we do. He suggests, ‘Because contemporary Christian ethicists have assumed that “the ethical” primarily concerns action and decision, they have found little moral significance in basic affirmations about God, Christ, grace, and sanctification.’ Yet as Paul’s teaching appears to 44 Berkouwer considers that, in the Old Testament, holiness is not a moral quality of one’s own endeavour; it concerns remaining aware of the sanctity we have from God and living accordingly. Berkouwer, Faith and Sanctification, 23.

---

47 Hauerwas, Vision and Virtue, 30.
48 Ibid., 45. For Hauerwas, the Christian life is about growing into the reality of these affirmations of God’s action in Christ (46). He writes, ‘The Christian is one so formed as he assumes the particular description offered him through the Church. This formation is the determination of our character through God’s sanctifying work. Sanctification is thus the formation of the Christian’s character that is the result of his intention to see the world as redeemed in Jesus Christ’ (67). Hauerwas proposes a form of virtue ethics which he calls an ‘ethics of character’. He argues that the traditional Protestant understanding of morality as obedience to the law and will of God, which defies our own moral efforts or attempts to determine the good, does not appreciate the influence of our inner nature on our acts and how the self is determined through its acts (Character and the Christian Life, 3-5). He writes, ‘To be sanctified is to have our character determined by our basic commitments and beliefs about God. It is a willingness to see and understand ourselves as having significance only as our agency is qualified under the form of Christ and the task he entrusts us. Christian character is the formation of our affections and actions according to the fundamental beliefs of the Christian faith and life’ (203). Hauerwas is concerned that without an ethics of character, either we turn to following suggest, the truth of God’s accomplishment in Christ and who humanity is in him is of utmost significance for how we lead our lives. When we are turned out of ourselves by the Spirit to find our lives in Christ, this is the basis of holy living.

Sharing by the Spirit in the Son’s Communion with the Father

The outworking of sanctification comes not only from this noetic process but, more fundamentally, participatory relationship. We were reconciled not only so that we may look to Christ as an example but so that we may participate in Christ and share by the Spirit in his intimate communion with the Father. Our sanctification is, according to T.F., a ‘sharing in his holy relation to the Father through the Holy Spirit’. It is union not atonement that is the goal of God’s reconciling purposes. We are not only saved but given to share in the life of God. J.B. often asserts, ‘In love God created us for “sonship”, to find our true being-in-communion, and in Jesus Christ gives us that gift of communion, through the Spirit, of being daughters and sons of the Father.’

J.B. distinguishes between three theological models: (1) the Harnack (Hick) model; (2) the existential, present-day experience model; and (3) the incarnational trinitarian model. The first is exemplified by nineteenth century modern liberalism and J.B. perceives it to be in part responsible for moralistic Christianity. It offers an external account of Jesus as a teacher of moral principles and leads to the Christian’s onerous task of following his example. The second model recognises the God-humanward movement in Christ and the external laws or to an automatic, mechanical process of grace producing holy living (194). His ethics of character highlights the importance of a change in our being if our beliefs are to have significance for our behaviour (227). Yet although Hauerwas’ ethics of character recognises the importance of placing our focus upon Christ, he does not have a concept of participation in Christ. It is not sufficient to have an external relationship with God or to know basic affirmations about Christ; we must share in his very life by the Spirit. Hauerwas describes a person’s self-determination of character as ‘dependent upon his ability to fix attention on descriptions and act accordingly’ (Vision and Virtue, 55; cf. Character and the Christian Life, 188; 215). This is in danger of throwing us back upon our own efforts; rather, it is the work of the Spirit to turn us out of ourselves to Christ and to lead fruitful lives.

---

49 T.F.T., Atonement, 386. Cf. T.F. writes, ‘In its ultimate sense, the holiness of the church is its relation to God, its participation in the fellowship of the divine being and life and truth’ (385).
50 T.F.T., Mediation, 77.
52 J.B. writes this in the context of worship but it can be applied to Christian activity more broadly.
work of atonement on the cross; yet it has no concept of his life-long vicarious humanity and the human-Godward movement in Christ, thereby making our response burdensome because it is detached from participation in Christ.\textsuperscript{54} The third model, which J.B. commends, appreciates both the God-humanward movement, the human-Godward movement and the Trinitarian dynamics of these movements.\textsuperscript{55} It conceives of the Christian life as ‘the gift of participating through the Spirit in the incarnate Son’s communion with the Father’.

The Torrances do not elucidate much further upon what this gift of participation means for the outworking of sanctification, but some insights may be offered by Noble. He proposes that as the Holy Spirit focuses our attention away from ourselves to Christ, and we share in his relationship with the Father, we reflect His holiness.\textsuperscript{57} He believes that ‘sanctification is coming into personal relationship with a Person in such a way that we increasingly image his scintillating holiness, his compassion, his patience, his self-discipline, his self-denial, his out-going love.’\textsuperscript{58} Noble compares this to the experience of a man falling in love with a woman. The man finds that he is turned out of himself and she brings out the best in him.\textsuperscript{59} The man does not seek this change for the better of itself; the end is her, to be with the woman, and his transformation is a byproduct.\textsuperscript{60} Noble argues, ‘It is objective experience of the real and living God that results in the subjective inner and outward change we call “sanctification.”’\textsuperscript{61} If we are to take Christ as an example, it should be of his intimate relationship with the Father in which we are also given to share by the Holy Spirit. Jesus lives a holy life because of his relationship with the Father in the Spirit and, as we share in that relationship, holiness will manifest in our lives too.\textsuperscript{62} Noble contends that Christ’s \textsuperscript{54} Ibid., 13-18. J.B. suggests that it is this model which is most widespread (22). This model is exemplified by some modern evangelical Protestantism, as explored in chapter two.

\textsuperscript{56} Ibid., 18.

\textsuperscript{57} Noble, \textit{Holy Trinity}, 18. Cf. T.F. considers that Calvin understands the \textit{imago dei} in terms of a mirror. We reflect God as we look to Him and therefore we must continually direct our mind and will towards God. See T.F.T., \textit{Calvin’s Doctrine of Man}, 35-39; 51-53; 61. Cf. ‘And we all, with unveiled faces, beholding the glory of the Lord, are being transformed into the same image from one degree of glory to another. For this comes from the Lord who is the Spirit.’ (2 Cor. 3:18)

\textsuperscript{58} Noble, \textit{Holy Trinity}, 160.

\textsuperscript{59} Ibid., 15-16. Noble’s analogy could be taken further for when a man falls in love with a woman, he can find that he cannot take his eyes off her. This resonates with the Biblical call to fix our eyes on Jesus and, as we look to him, be transformed in his image.

\textsuperscript{60} Noble, \textit{Holy Trinity}, 16. Cf. Augustine: ‘\textit{dilige et quod vis fac}’ (‘Love, and do what you will’).

\textit{Augustine, In epistulam Ioannis ad Parthos}, VII/8. Cf. Jesus’ words: “If you love me, you will keep my commandments” (John 14:15).

\textsuperscript{61} Noble, \textit{Holy Trinity}, 17.

\textsuperscript{62} Ibid., 200. Noble argues that this must not be understood individualistically, as is an evangelical Protestant tendency; the church reflects the image of God corporately, not individually (219-20).
victory over evil is not the key to living a holy life but the consequence; 'The inner secret is his relationship with the Father, and that relationship is a relationship in the Spirit.'

This means that the outworking of sanctification is not an external, legal process. Smail regrets the tendency in modern evangelicalism towards the legalistic following of rules:

Evangelicals have tended to major on initiation into the Christian life, to concentrate on its beginnings and to run out of steam when it comes to its growth and maturing by talking of the saved life in legal and moralistic terms, almost as if it were a matter of conformity to rather external standards of ethical conduct, religious practice and evangelistic duty.

Yet we have not simply been forgiven and given a second chance to adhere to the law. T.F. is emphatic that the church is not a group of individuals who seek to follow common moral principles; the church is a community of persons ontologically transformed in Christ who share by the Spirit in his relationship with the Father. Canlis writes of Calvin’s conception of the ‘identity-forming ministry’ of the Spirit, who reveals who we are as adopted sons of the Father. The Spirit directs us out of ourselves, away from our own attempts at perfect performance, to God and our relationship with Him, which is the basis of living the Christian life. She writes, ‘The Holy Spirit ushers us into adoption, not workaholism; the Spirit tells us not so much what to do, but who we are.’ For T.F., any external conception of holy living by adhering to laws is excluded by Paul’s language of the church as the ‘body of Christ’. The church inheres in Christ; it does not follow abstract rules.

J.B. contends that Scripture is not a book of law but a revelation of grace. Looking to the New Testament witness, Hays argues that it is not meant to be taken as a static book of rules: ‘Paul nowhere sets forth a systematic presentation of “Christian ethics”. Nor does he offer his communities a “manual of discipline,” a comprehensive summary of community organization and duties.’ Breaking with the norm of the ancient world, Paul responds dynamically to issues that arise, in all things pointing to the person of Christ. 1 Timothy is testament to the problem of a second-generation reception of Paul whereby his teaching is taken for granted and morality becomes static. Hays writes,

1 Timothy articulates the moral vision of a Christian community that has achieved a measure of institutional and symbolic stability; the writer is no longer thinking through ethical issues from their theological foundations. All that needs to be done is to guard the tradition entrusted by the apostle. The result? A gain in stability, but a loss in profundity and freedom. In the authentic Pauline letters, the churches are repeatedly exhorted to discern the will of God anew under the guidance of the Holy Spirit; in 2 Timothy, there is no call for discernment because the will of God has already been sufficiently made known in the “sound teaching” of the tradition.

As Hauerwas argues, ‘The specification of the Christian life, even in its most appealing and cogent form, always runs the risk of being made an end in itself – a program to be achieved rather than a mode of being to be lived out.’ He regrets that law can be used as a substitute for relationship with Christ:

The proposal of the shape of the Christian life tends to be used as a substitute for him alone who can give substance to the proposal. The Christian life cannot be specified by a set of virtues to be achieved apart from their arising as a response to Jesus Christ; nor can it be interpreted solely as a pattern of rules to follow or good acts to do.

a man to say that he honors the law of God and for that reason strives towards holiness. The people of Israel offer proof that one may live in the climate of absolute imperatives and still perish.’

71 Ibid., 17; 43.

72 Ibid., 71.

73 Ibid.

74 Hauerwas, Character and the Christian Life, 182. In advancing a dynamic, relational account of ethics, this is not to be confused with systems such as Joseph Fletcher’s situation ethics (see Joseph Fletcher, Situation Ethics: The New Morality (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 1966)). Dynamism from an anthropocentric starting point is as erroneous as adhering to static rules. The dynamism must not be abstracted from its centre in Christ; it comes from participating by the Spirit in his relationship with the Father.

75 Hauerwas, Character and the Christian Life, 182.
We fulfil the law not by adhering to static rules, argues J.B., but dynamically through the presence of the Spirit in us and our participation in Christ.\(^{76}\) For T.F., fulfilment of the law is actually a dark, not a virtuous, endeavour when it is detached from participation in the person of Christ:

> The human heart is so desperately wicked that it cunningly takes advantage of the hiatus between what we are and what we ought to be in order to latch on to the patterns and structures of moral behaviour required of us, so that under the image of what is good and right it masks or even fortifies its evil intentions. Such is the self-deception of our human heart and the depravity of our self-will that we seek to justify ourselves before God and our neighbours by a formal, impersonal fulfilment of the divine law in which we remain untouched in ourselves and uncommitted in our own persons. Yet all the time we are fostering the very processes of dehumanisation at work in the depths of our beings and trapping ourselves inescapably in insincere and hypocritical personalities.\(^{77}\)

Similarly, Barth believes that ethical behaviour is a matter of following God’s will by the Spirit through participating in Christ.\(^{78}\) It is futile and sinful for humanity to attempt to be its own judge and distinguish between good and evil, which is how the serpent tempted Adam and Eve.\(^{79}\) Godly living is dynamic, not static, flowing from relationship with God rather than from our own beliefs about what is right and wrong.\(^{80}\) Dietrich Bonhoeffer likewise argues that the moral Christian life comes not by being turned in upon ourselves, judging what is good and evil, but rather by being turned out of ourselves in relationship with God.\(^{81}\) What distinguishes Christian ethics from other ethical systems is that it is not concerned with the knowledge of good and evil.\(^{82}\) Only God has this knowledge and to try and attain it is to attempt to assume the role of God.\(^{83}\) When Adam and Eve ate the forbidden fruit in the Garden of Eden, they were turning away from God and in upon themselves.\(^{84}\)

---

\(^{76}\) J.B.T., ‘Prayer and the Priesthood of Christ’, 61

\(^{77}\) T.F.T., Mediation, 81. In fact, focusing not on Christ but on the law hinders the outworking of our sanctification. As Paul asserts, sin abounds under the law (Rom. 5:20).

\(^{78}\) Barth, Church Dogmatics II/2 451; IV/2, 372-74.

\(^{79}\) Barth, Church Dogmatics IV.1, 446.

\(^{80}\) Barth, Church Dogmatics II/2, 646-47.

\(^{82}\) Ibid., 3.

\(^{83}\) Ibid., 5.

\(^{84}\) Ibid., 4-6.
Bonhoeffer suggests that Jesus comes into opposition with the Pharisees on account of their being wholly centred upon the knowledge of good and evil.\(^{85}\) When they ask Jesus questions which concern the conflict between the knowledge of good and evil, his answer seems to elude them, for his concern is not with the knowledge of good and evil but centred upon God.\(^{86}\) Bonhoeffer writes, ‘He seems to be answering quite a different question from that which has been put to Him... He speaks with a complete freedom which is not bound by the law of logical alternatives.’\(^{87}\) Jesus’ actions are not influenced by moral dilemmas, but by a sure trust in the will of God: ‘He lives and acts not by the knowledge of good and evil but by the will of God.’\(^{88}\) When we seek to know Christ and our reconciliation with God instead of good and evil, we discover true knowledge and are set free for whole-hearted devotion to the will of God.\(^{89}\) He writes,

> The knowledge of Jesus is entirely transformed into action, without any reflection upon a man’s self... His deed has become entirely unquestioning; he is entirely devoted to his deed and filled with it; his deed is no longer one possibility among many, but the one thing, the important thing, the will of God.\(^{90}\)

Bonhoeffer argues that we should be turned out of ourselves, not judging our own actions or those of others, and live faithfully through relationship with God. The New Testament is not so much concerned with ethical problems as with our reconciliation in Christ.\(^{91}\) The outworking of sanctification comes not from knowledge of good and evil but from our union with God.\(^{92}\)

D.W.T. laments that sermons are preached which offer only cumbersome exhortations concerning what is the right thing to do. He calls for preaching which is centred upon the person of Christ so that we might come into relationship with the Father:

> ...if you look at ministry today, probably ninety percent of all our preaching is telling people what to do. We lay tremendous burdens on the congregation. Our congregations get weary and tired, and many slip away. And the ministers themselves, they get frustrated and they leave. They’re trying to go ahead in ministry, but under their own steam, using their own efforts, their own...

\(^{85}\) Ibid., 12-13.
\(^{86}\) Ibid, 13.
\(^{87}\) Ibid., 14.
\(^{88}\) Ibid., 15.
\(^{89}\) Ibid., 18-20.
\(^{90}\) Ibid., 19-20.
\(^{91}\) Ibid., 11.
\(^{92}\) Unfortunately Bonhoeffer’s thoughts were cut short as his work was unfinished.
resources. I believe quite strongly that in the ministry we are called here to proclaim Christ, the person of Christ... If we keep our eye on Christ and seek to present Christ to the world, this is something very exciting, something very living and alive. We see people coming face-to-face with God in Jesus Christ.

J.B. extends this to all pastoral situations, believing that instead of directing people to which is the right or wrong action to take, the first and foremost mission is to direct people to Christ so that we might share by the Spirit in his intimate relationship with the Father:

It seems to me that in a pastoral situation, our first task is not to throw people back on themselves with exhortations and instructions as to what to do and how to do it, but to direct people to the gospel of grace – to Jesus Christ, that they might look to him to lead them, open their hearts in faith and in prayer, and draw them by the Spirit into his eternal life of communion with the Father.

When J.B. speaks of God’s filial purpose in the context of atonement, this might also be applied to the outworking of sanctification in the Christian life: ‘...God’s primary purpose for humanity is ‘filial’, not just ‘judicial’, where we have been created in the image of God to find our true being-in-communion, in ‘sonship’, in the mutual personal relations of love.’ In the outworking of sanctification, God’s primary purpose for humanity is not to adhere to external rules and regulations (judicial) but to participate by the Spirit in the Son’s communion with the Father (filial).

Conclusion

The outworking of our sanctification comes as we are turned out of ourselves by the Spirit to Christ and the truth of our identity in him so that we might share in his communion with the Father and grow into who we are in Christ.

As we live in the eschatological reserve, sin is an abiding presence. It is the irrational rejection of God whereby a person seeks to usurp the place of God. This arises from a misunderstanding of God as cruel or distant and from a misunderstanding of humanity as self-determining. Essentially sin is fed by a lack of knowing what has been objectively achieved for humanity in Christ. Through fear of a perceived lack, a person wretchedly attempts to acquire what we already have in Christ. He does not enjoy what he already has in Christ; he is turned in upon himself. Sin can thus be characterised as homo incurvatus in se.

---

However, the Holy Spirit turns a person out of himself (homo excurvatus ex se) to find his life satisfied in Christ. Our true centre of existence is Christ, which is expressed in the language of the church as the body of Christ. When a person is turned out of himself in undivided devotion to God, this is the essence of holiness. It is not a holiness in terms of perfect performance but in terms of a relative maturity or wholeness. We can find rest and satisfaction in Christ’s vicarious humanity. Instead of struggling with the flesh, the Spirit empowers us to lead a life faithful to the Father.

When we turn to Christ, this is the meaning of repentance. We are directed away from ourselves to Christ and to hold to what is true of our lives in him. We are to share in his mind and be determined by his truth. This means that our beliefs should be shaped by the truth of who we are in Christ, rather than our earthly experiences of sinfulness. Knowing what we have already been given in Christ is significant for acting accordingly, evident by Paul’s repeated affirmation of the early Christians’ identity in Christ followed by exhortations to live accordingly. Yet the outworking of sanctification comes not only from knowing about God but, more fundamentally, knowing God. As a man who falls in love with a woman is transformed, so is a person who encounters the triune God of grace.

This means that the outworking of sanctification is not an external, legal process and Scripture is not a static book of rules. God does not intend for us to be turned back in upon ourselves, judging what is good and what is evil, and directing others to burdensome activities in detachment from Christ. God’s purposes are primarily filial, not federal: we are to enjoy sharing by the Spirit in Christ’s intimate communion with the Father, and as we do so we may find ourselves growing to resemble his likeness.
Conclusion

This thesis has sought to uphold the Torrances’ filial, ontological and objective soteriology and constructively extend its implications to sanctification. In so doing, it seeks to offer a vital, liberating message: salvation and sanctification are not burdensome endeavours but the free gift of enjoying communion with the triune God of grace. Although humanity lives in the eschatological reserve, in a world of continuing sin and evil, we are neither defined nor ruled by it; we are determined by the risen humanity of Christ. The Holy Spirit turns us out of ourselves to participate in the life of Christ and, as we do so, we grow to reflect the reality of who we are in him.

This line of argument seeks to be faithful to what God has revealed to us in Christ. As we have seen, it is impossible to understand God’s ways within our own rational frameworks of thought. Salvation and sanctification defy logico-causal reasoning and the eschatological reserve means that God’s purposes are fully accomplished and yet not fully manifest. If we attempt to make God’s mysteries black and white, we will only glimpse a part of the truth. There can be truth in opposing arguments. It is a tricky task to express faithfully the eschatological tension and the seeming paradox of participation. Different contexts will necessarily need to address different issues, thereby shifting emphases.96 This thesis has sought to redress an imbalance that leans towards a poor view of humanity and the outworking of our sanctification. The argument for confidence in the nature of our humanity and the outworking of our sanctification may be the most challenging premise.\footnote{For those not of a Pentecostal-Charismatic or Wesleyan tradition, this may be particularly difficult to agree with.} Yet it is not to deny the eschatological tension and the continuing presence of sin in the world, nor is it a boast in our own efforts. It seeks to reflect the confidence of the Biblical witness and appreciate what has been accomplished for us in Christ.

96 The Torrance brothers seek to emphasise Christ’s priestly office over against his prophetic and kingly offices in order to counteract attitudes which bypass his vicarious and mediatorial role and therefore throw people back upon themselves.

A comprehensive summary of this thesis’ line of argument can be found in the chapter conclusions. The purpose of this final conclusion is to highlight some key issues concerning the Torrances’ claim that all of humanity is in Christ and to suggest that which might benefit from further discussion.

The Prospective Life

The Torrances’ soteriology helpfully draws attention to the prospective aspect of the atonement: we are not only retrospectively forgiven of our sins but also adopted as sons and daughters of God to share by the Spirit in the Son’s communion with the Father. Yet some who are appreciative of the Torrances lament that they do not adequately elaborate on the nature of the prospective life.\footnote{Habets, \textit{Theosis}, 186-9; Eugenio, ‘Communion with God’, 185.} It is true that, although the Torrances have a profound understanding of what Christ by the Spirit has done for us vicariously in human flesh, there is much less exposition on what a person’s life in Christ by the Spirit might look like.\footnote{For T.F., there is an inherent difficulty in describing the prospective aspect of the atonement: ‘... we are permitted to speak here of the new age only with a prayer of forgiveness, for the very language we use in improper and must pass away with the nomistic forms of this world... We can speak about it only in stammering ways, in the fragmented figures of apocalyptic imagery.’ T.F.T., \textit{Space, Time and Resurrection}, 100. Cf. Hauerwas reflects on the difficulty of making statements about the prospective nature of our mystical union with Christ since it will not be fully consummated until the end. Hauerwas, \textit{Character and the Christian Life}, 184.}

Although the Torrances do not spell out the shape of the Christian life, their lives are a dynamic testament to the radical ethical and socio-political imperatives of their theology. T.F., for example, sought to preserve the life of the unborn child in the face of the abortion debate and J.B., for example, felt compelled to challenge boldly apartheid in South Africa.\footnote{T.F.T., \textit{The Being and Nature of the Unborn Child} (Edinburgh: Handsel Press, 2000); J.B.T., ‘Calvin and Puritanism in England and Scotland’, Address to the Congress for the Advancement of Calvin Research, 12-14 August 1980, Pretoria, South Africa; J.B.T., ‘Southern Africa Today: The Kairos Debate:}
The Torrances saw that God’s claiming of humanity in Christ had far-reaching implications for how we engage with every facet of human existence. Students of the Torrances and others continue to explore the implications of their theology for the nature of the Christian life. Yet the benefit of not statically spelling out the shape of the Christian life is that they evade the danger of moralistic interpretation. Whilst the Torrances’ theology might leave us with various questions regarding the Christian life, they direct us to where we can find the ultimate answer: through participating by the Spirit in the Son’s intimate communion with the Father.

Our Human Response

The Torrances’ objective account of salvation attracts the recurrent criticism that our human freedom and activity is negated or diminished. Yet this is to misunderstand the nature of human freedom and the way in which our activity relates to God in Christ. Our sinful self-will is mistaken for freedom, yet it only serves to usurp our freedom. It is true that our sinful self-will is set aside by God’s objective activity but this is for the sake of our liberation, that we might gain real freedom.

Likewise, the only human activity that is negated is that which keeps us captive, for the sake of humanizing us and enabling activity in its proper place. When our human activity is conceived of as an independent, logico-causal response, or in any way contributing to our salvation or sanctification, it becomes a heavy burden for us. Our faith and works are intended as a free response to God’s grace, rather than as a means to earn it. Moreover, this is not an independent, logico-causal response; our response is a participation by the Spirit in a response already made by Christ. This means that we do not have to depend upon the adequacy of our own response; we are upheld by the faithfulness of Christ. Human activity that is independent, merit-based and burdensome is diminished, for the sake of affirming human activity in its proper place, that is, as a free and joyful participation by the Spirit in what God has already accomplished in Christ.

Hopeful Universalism

Despite the Torrances asserting otherwise, their theology is often misunderstood for universalism. This is because universal atonement seems to lead logically to universalism. T.F. argues against universalism for the reason that we cannot understand God’s ways according to logico-causal categories. He points to the irrational reality of sin whereby some choose to reject God. Yet T.F.’s argument is perhaps also subject to logico-causal categories. Whilst sin is irrational, it is logical to maintain that, from our earthly experience of people rejecting God, these people must not ultimately be saved.

However, extending the implications of the Torrances’ soteriology to sanctification, we see that our lives are determined by the eschatological orientation of the risen humanity of Christ. This is our ultimate reality, although it will not be fully manifest until the Parousia. Until then, we are directed away from ourselves to Christ, to shape our beliefs by the truth of who we are in him, rather than by our earthly experiences of sinfulness. With this in mind, it might be argued that, although we should not affirm a definite logico-causal universalism, we must not assume that those who reject God now will not ultimately be saved. Despite contrary earthly experience, we should hold to the truth of our eschatological orientation revealed in Christ and have confidence in the possibility of the ultimate reconciliation of all humanity.

Robin Parry draws upon T.F.’s repeated phrase that ‘there is no God behind the back of Jesus’, pointing out that, if we don’t come to a universalist conclusion regarding people whom we see reject God, ‘then something other than the gospel of Christ is determining their end.’ He argues, ‘Far more theologically satisfying, to my mind, is the proposal that the resurrection-ascension of Christ is the revelation of the destiny of humanity and the promise that it will come to pass.\textsuperscript{103}

---

T.F. argues that the reality of hell and the necessity of evangelism defy a universalist position. Yet the reality of hell can be upheld alongside the possibility of universalism as only a temporary fate. The irrational rejection of God accounts for the reality of hell but not for an eternal hell. Nor does the possibility of universalism exclude the necessity of evangelism. First, hell is very much a reality, albeit temporary. Second, since all of humanity is to be ultimately reconciled, evangelism is made universal in scope. Third, evangelism means that people’s lives are transformed in the present as they discover the gift of sharing by the Spirit in the Son’s communion with the Father.

T.F. also believes that a definite logico-causal universalism destroys the free decision of faith. Yet this is not necessarily true with regards to a stance which holds to the possibility of universalism. Parry argues that true freedom actually liberates us to accept God’s salvation. God’s self-revelation is liberating, not oppressive: ‘By so revealing himself, God is not forcing an agent to act against free will but simply clarifying the situation in such a way that the will changes... The only way for God to keep the damned continually choosing to resist him forever is by shielding them from the real consequences of their actions, thus denying them the possibility of making a fully informed decision.’\textsuperscript{104} This resonates with the Torrances’ belief that God’s objective claiming of humanity is ultimately liberating, and grace leads to the free response of Godly living.

It is not the purpose of this thesis to debate the possibility of universalism but, from the implications regarding sanctification that arise from the Torrances’ soteriology, it does seek to show that it is an issue which requires further consideration. Whilst the universalist implications of the Torrances’ theology is a cause of contention for critics, perhaps it might be found to be a positive aspect. Perhaps if the Church were guided by confidence in Christ, we might be more hopeful about the eschatological orientation of our humanity.

\textsuperscript{103} Ibid. In his book, Parry argues for universalism from philosophical reasoning, the Biblical metanarrative and biblical-theological context, and addresses the hell passages in Revelation.

\textsuperscript{104} Ibid., 30.
Conclusion

This thesis presents the Torrances’ claim that all of humanity is in Christ. Whilst it has sought to defend this claim, it does not argue for uncritical adoption of the Torrances’ theology. Since our lives are determined by the eschatological orientation of the risen humanity of Christ, and Scripture exhorts us to focus on heavenly truth rather than earthly experience, this seems to make it difficult for the Torrances not to hope in the ultimate reconciliation of all humanity. Furthermore, the Torrances’ profoundly personal, relational and participatory scheme of salvation indicates a God whom humanity can not only know but experience intimately. A greater openness to and consideration of the mystical and experiential aspects of the Christian life would therefore complement this scheme of salvation. In relation to this, a more detailed exposition of the Spirit’s action upon Jesus’ humanity would aid a better understanding of the Spirit’s action upon us today. Whilst it is imperative to make a proper distinction between God and humanity to avoid the ‘danger of vertigo’, it is also important to take proper account of the likeness which God calls us to through participating in Christ by the Holy Spirit. The Torrances’ theology would be complemented by a greater appreciation of what humanity has received and is called to in Christ.

A fuller appreciation of this present reality challenges the tendency to conceive of humanity primarily in terms of sinfulness, and the resulting resignation to sin as a life-long struggle. Whilst T.F. displays an intense confidence on account of our new eschatological orientation in Christ, there is little positive discussion of what this means for humanity in the outworking of sanctification. This is perhaps due to the Torrances’ concern to emphasise Christ’s priestly office in order to counteract attitudes which throw people back upon themselves. Yet a deeper exploration of Christ’s kingly office would further this concern for it declares that we are seated in a place of victory and rest. The Torrances appear to be somewhat characteristic of their Reformed tradition in their emphasis upon the objective work of God and lack of exploration of the subjective nature of sanctification. Whilst this may have been due to a concern to avoid moralism, it is unfortunate because the Torrances’ soteriology actually offers the crucial foundation for challenging moralism whilst also appreciating the obligations of grace.

The Torrances’ claim that all of humanity is in Christ is essential because it liberates us from our own efforts to earn our relationship with God and, extending the implications to sanctification, become the kind of person that we ought to be. God has objectively claimed humanity for salvation in Christ prior to anything that we could contribute and the radical claim which this places upon humanity is to grow to reflect the ontological reality of who we are in him as we freely share by the Spirit in the Son’s filial communion with the Father.
Bibliography

Athanasius, De incarnatione verbi dei.

Athanasius, Contra Gentes.

Augustine, In epistulam Ioannis ad Parthos, VII.

Saucy, Robert L., ‘“Sinners” who are Forgiven or “Saints” who Sin?’ Bibliotheca Sacra 152 (1995).

Smail, Thomas, ‘Third Person Singular – The Trinitarian Spirit’. Presidential Address to the annual meeting of the Scottish Church Theology Society, Crieff, 10-14 January 2011.

Torrance, Thomas F., ‘Itinerarium Mentis In Deum: My Theological Development’. The Thomas F. Torrance Manuscript Collection, Princeton Theological Seminary, Box 10.

Torrance, Thomas F., ‘Romans 6’, Sermon to Alyth Parish in 1943. The Thomas F. Torrance Manuscript Collection, Princeton Theological Seminary, Box 45.

Torrance, Thomas F., ‘Colossians 3:3’, Sermon to Alyth Parish in 1940 and Beechgrove Parish in 1948. The Thomas F. Torrance Manuscript Collection, Princeton Theological Seminary, Box 47.

Torrance, Thomas F., ‘Predestination in Christ’.* Evangelical Quarterly* 13 (1941).

